Red Banyan Publishes Legal PR Resource Hub for Attorneys and Law Firms

October 23, 2026

FORT LAUDERDALE, FL - October 23, 2026 -
Red Banyan has developed a centralized legal PR resource hub designed to help attorneys, law firms, executives, individuals, and organizations better understand the communications challenges that can arise when lawsuits, investigations, allegations, and other legal matters attract public attention. The resource brings together guidance on litigation communications, attorney reputation, law firm visibility, media relations, media training, monitoring, and thought leadership, giving readers a practical starting point for understanding how communications strategy can work alongside legal counsel when a matter extends beyond the courtroom.

Legal disputes often develop in two distinct arenas. The formal legal process determines the legal issues involved, while news coverage, online discussion, search results, and public commentary can shape how a matter is understood by clients, employees, business partners, professional peers, and other audiences. Communication strategy does not replace legal strategy or determine the outcome of a case, but it can help organizations and individuals make more deliberate decisions about what is communicated publicly and when.

The new resource hub is organized around common questions that arise before, during, and after high-profile legal matters. It includes introductory guidance for readers unfamiliar with litigation communications, as well as more focused material on law firm reputation, public relations for individual attorneys, media preparation, monitoring, practice-area considerations, and proactive visibility.

?Legal matters can move quickly once public attention becomes part of the equation, and communications decisions are often being made at the same time as important legal decisions,? Evan Nierman said. ?Having a clearer understanding of the communications side before that pressure increases can give organizations and individuals more room to make thoughtful choices.?

One of the central themes of the resource is the distinction between litigation communications and the broader field of legal PR. Litigation-focused communications generally center on an active or anticipated lawsuit, while the broader discipline can also include regulatory investigations, public allegations, sensitive announcements, attorney reputation, law firm visibility, and longer-term thought leadership. In either setting, public-facing communications should support the legal team's work rather than interfere with it.

The hub also addresses the role of media relations when reporters begin asking questions about a case. The decision to respond, decline to comment, provide background, or offer clarification should be made deliberately and in coordination with the legal posture of the matter. A rushed response can create unnecessary complications, while complete silence may leave journalists relying exclusively on court filings, opposing parties, public records, social media, or other available sources.

Media training is another area covered in the resource. Attorneys, executives, and other spokespeople may face difficult questions about allegations, filings, prior statements, or issues that extend beyond the immediate dispute. Preparation can help a spokesperson remain focused on approved information, communicate clearly, and avoid speculation or language that creates additional reputational concerns.

Monitoring becomes increasingly important once a matter is public. Traditional news coverage, social media discussions, search results, and other online conversations can change quickly as new developments emerge. Tracking those changes can help communications teams determine whether a situation calls for clarification, correction, engagement, or continued observation rather than an immediate response.

The resource also looks beyond reactive communications. Attorneys and law firms can build visibility over time through bylined articles, expert commentary, media interviews, and other forms of thought leadership. A consistent professional profile can help establish credibility before a controversial or high-profile issue develops and can provide additional context if public scrutiny increases later.

?Communications planning is not only about responding after something has gone wrong,? Kelcey Kintner said. ?Preparing spokespeople, understanding audiences, monitoring developments, and establishing clear messaging ahead of time can make the response process more organized when circumstances begin moving quickly.?

Different practice areas can also create different communications pressures. Employment disputes, criminal defense matters, personal injury cases, and corporate litigation may involve different audiences, sensitivities, confidentiality concerns, and media dynamics. The resource encourages readers to consider those differences rather than applying the same communications approach to every legal situation.

Case examples included in the hub provide additional context for how litigation communications can work in practice. The examples cover matters involving online harassment and related litigation, communications support for an organization in the utility sector, and work connected to a law firm involved in a $35 million

Ponzi scheme matter. The purpose of those examples is to illustrate how communications considerations can vary depending on the circumstances surrounding the legal issue.

The broader takeaway is that public communications should be planned with the same level of care as other high-stakes decisions in a legal matter. Organizations and individuals facing potential scrutiny can benefit from identifying likely audiences, reviewing who is authorized to speak publicly, preparing approved messaging, establishing media-response procedures, and determining how developments will be monitored before attention intensifies.

Red Banyan?s resource hub provides a central place to review those considerations and determine which areas may require additional preparation. Attorneys, law firms, executives, and organizations can use the guidance to review current communications procedures, identify gaps in media readiness, assess reputation risks, and clarify internal responsibilities before a legal matter becomes more difficult to manage.
