Superior Roofing & Restoration Expands Operations

November 06, 2026

EAU CLAIRE, WI - November 06, 2026 -
Superior Roofing & Restoration has expanded its home exterior services to include siding installation and repair, adding a new category of work to the company?s existing roofing and restoration operations. The change broadens the company?s role in residential exterior projects, where siding helps protect buildings from weather and contributes to a home?s appearance.

The company said the expansion follows preparation and team training focused on current siding materials and installation methods. It did not disclose how many employees completed training, when the service became available, or how many projects it expects to undertake. With the addition, the company is now operating as a siding contractor in Wausau, WI, alongside its existing roofing and restoration work.

The new service will cover several common siding materials, including vinyl, fiber cement, wood, and metal. Each has different characteristics involving cost, maintenance, durability, and appearance. Vinyl is generally associated with relatively low maintenance, while fiber cement is often selected for its resistance to moisture, pests, and fire. Wood offers a traditional appearance but typically requires more upkeep; metal siding provides durability and a different range of finishes. The appropriate material depends on a building?s condition, exposure and the property owner?s priorities.

Siding forms part of a building?s exterior envelope. Along with roofing, windows and other components, properly selected and installed siding can help protect wall assemblies from rain, wind and temperature changes. Performance also depends on details beneath and around the siding, including flashing, drainage, insulation, and ventilation. Assessing the full wall system is important when planning exterior work, rather than considering the visible siding material alone.

The expansion comes as homeowners in central Wisconsin consider how exterior materials perform through seasonal temperature changes, precipitation, and severe weather. Such conditions can place stress on exterior surfaces over time. The company?s addition of siding creates the option to address another part of a home?s exterior through the same business, although the announcement did not include local market data or figures measuring demand for siding work.

Superior Roofing & Restoration also announced an online resource center focused on siding. The company said the section of its website will include articles, guides and frequently asked questions about siding materials and project considerations. The information is intended to explain differences among available options and help readers prepare questions before making decisions about exterior work. The company did not provide a publication schedule or say how often the resource will be updated.

The company also said it intends to consider environmental factors in its siding offerings and incorporate options it identifies as more sustainable. The announcement did not identify specific products, manufacturers, recycled-content standards or environmental certifications. Such details can help consumers compare materials, including their production impacts, expected service life, maintenance requirements, and end-of-life disposal.

The addition marks a change in the range of work offered by Superior Roofing & Restoration, which has provided roofing and restoration services in the Wausau area. With siding installation and repair now included, the company can address another component of residential exterior maintenance and improvement. Residents seeking information about the new service or the online resource center can find details on the company?s website.

For homeowners considering siding projects, relevant factors include material specifications, installation requirements, warranties, maintenance needs, and compliance with applicable building codes. Property conditions and weather exposure vary, so a material suitable for one home may not be the best choice for another. The expanded service adds another local option for residents considering siding installation or repairs from a siding contractor in Wausau, WI.
