Siam Legal International Welcomes eGate Access for Returning British Travelers

November 24, 2026

Bangkok, Thailand - November 24, 2026 -
Siam Legal International, a full-service law firm with more than 22 years of experience in Thailand, has welcomed the opening of Thailand's new electronic arrival gates to British passport holders, giving returning travelers from the United Kingdom a faster route through immigration at Bangkok's Suvarnabhumi Airport. The United Kingdom is one of 33 countries and territories whose citizens may now use the automated lanes, provided they meet four conditions set for the system.

The change addresses the final and often least welcome stage of a long-haul journey. After many hours of travel from London, arriving passengers have typically faced another long queue at the immigration counters before entering Thailand. With an eGate, an eligible traveler scans their passport, looks into the camera, and walks straight through.

Alongside the United Kingdom, the eligible list includes Australia, Canada, Japan, South Korea, and much of Europe. The United States is not yet on the list, and access to the gates is not automatic for every traveler holding an eligible passport.

The system is designed around returning visitors rather than newcomers. Travelers must have entered Thailand before on the same passport, because the eGates match fingerprints and a photograph recorded during that earlier visit. First-time visitors are directed to a staffed counter, as is anyone who has renewed their passport since their last trip, even if they have visited Thailand many times before.

British travelers must also be entering Thailand visa-free to use the gates. Those arriving on a visa continue to use the regular immigration desks. The final condition is submitting the Thailand Digital Arrival Card (TDAC) before landing, a step required of all arrivals regardless of which lane they use.

"Anyone who has made the long flight from London knows that the immigration queue can feel like the longest part of the journey, so this is a genuinely welcome change for returning British visitors," said Rex Baay, Senior Immigration Consultant and Operations Manager at Siam Legal International. "The key detail is that the gates recognize travelers from a previous visit, so a recently renewed passport will send even a frequent visitor back to the staffed counter for that first trip."

For now, the eGates operate only at Suvarnabhumi Airport in Bangkok. More locations are expected to be rolled out in phases, which may in time extend the same convenience to travelers arriving through other international airports in Thailand.

The timing is relevant for British travelers planning trips over the coming months. Visa-free stays for British passport holders are now capped at 30 days, down from 60, a period that covers a typical holiday but falls well short of a full winter season away from the United Kingdom. Travelers who intend to stay longer will need to enter on a visa, which means using the staffed immigration desks rather than the eGates.

For those considering a longer stay, Thailand offers long-stay options that come with their own arrival arrangements. Thailand Privilege, the official long-stay membership program of Thailand, includes a visa with membership, and members are met on arrival by a personal assistant who accompanies them through a dedicated fast-track lane. Siam Legal's eGate arrival video sets out how the eGates and the fast-track lane compare for different types of travelers.

The eGate rollout marks a practical improvement for British visitors who return to Thailand regularly. Those who meet all four conditions can now complete arrival in moments, while first-time visitors and travelers with new passports will pass through a staffed counter, with their details recorded for future visits.
