Skin Elevé Expands PRF and Bio-Filler Availability

November 27, 2026

CHATSWORTH, CA - November 27, 2026 -
Skin Elevé, a medical aesthetic spa based in Chatsworth, California, is expanding access to its under-eye rejuvenation services, including PRF injections and bio-filler, for adults in Simi Valley, Northridge, Porter Ranch, West Hills, Reseda, and Canoga Park. The expansion follows a steady rise in inquiries about platelet-derived treatment options from those communities.

Skin Elevé provides PRF and bio-filler treatments for the area beneath the eyes to clients throughout the western San Fernando Valley, assessing existing volume, skin characteristics, and each client's goals before recommending an approach. Platelet-rich fibrin begins with a small blood draw, which is processed to isolate the material, which is then applied to the treatment area, distinguishing it from manufactured hyaluronic acid fillers. Under-eye bio-filler uses the same PRF material, prepared into a gel-like consistency, and is offered as an additional option within the clinic's broader facial rejuvenation services.

The under-eye area varies from person to person. What reads as hollowness in one client may reflect volume loss, skin quality, or both in another, which is why Skin Elevé's providers start with an assessment of the treatment area rather than defaulting to the same procedure for every case. Temporary swelling is common after treatment, and the area's appearance can continue to shift as it subsides, with timelines varying by individual.

"The under-eye area requires careful assessment because small differences in anatomy and volume can influence treatment planning," said Mary Bilbulyan, owner of Skin Elevé. "We focus on selecting an approach that fits the individual instead of treating every concern with the same product or technique, and education about the options is part of every consultation."

PRF sits alongside Skin Elevé's other collagen-focused and regenerative services, including microneedling, collagen stimulators, dermal fillers, and related facial procedures, each with its own materials, application, and expected progression. The clinic also uses PRF elsewhere in its service menu, including facial and hair-related treatments, with under-eye application representing a more localized use of the same material.

Consultations are where these distinctions get sorted out. Providers discuss expected progression, session count, aftercare, and whether a given method aligns with what a client is noticing, keeping the recommendation tied to the individual rather than to a general description such as under-eye filler. Some plans call for more than one appointment, spaced over a period the provider outlines during the initial visit.

Clients typically arrive at this decision from one of two directions. Some have researched PRF specifically after hearing about platelet-derived treatments and want to know whether it is suitable for their anatomy. Others come in describing a general concern, tiredness around the eyes, a hollow appearance in photographs, without a fixed idea of which procedure applies, and rely on the consultation to narrow the options. Skin Elevé's providers treat both starting points the same way, working from the assessment rather than from the client's initial assumption about which treatment is best.

The blood draw and processing steps also set expectations for the appointment itself. Because the material used in PRF and bio-filler comes from the client's own body, preparation takes longer than a conventional filler appointment, and providers walk clients through that timeline before the procedure begins. This preparation period is also when a provider reviews medical history and any factors that might affect suitability, since platelet-derived treatments are not automatically appropriate for every client, as a standard consultation might assume.

Bio-filler's gel-like consistency is intended to hold its position differently than liquid PRF once applied, which is part of why Skin Elevé treats the two as separate options rather than interchangeable versions of the same procedure. A provider may recommend PRF for a client whose primary concern is skin quality and texture beneath the eyes, while bio-filler may be considered where more defined volume support is the goal. That distinction is explained during consultation rather than assumed from the client's initial description of their concern.

The expanded availability gives residents of Simi Valley, Northridge, Porter Ranch, West Hills, Reseda, and Canoga Park access to the same consultation process offered at Skin Elevé's Chatsworth location. Additional information about PRF and bio-filler treatment options is available through the clinic's website.
