February 18, 2016 -

Beltmann Integrated Logistics, a third party logistics firm in Addison, IL, is pleased to announce a huge increase in their business over the past few months. This is due to the fact that more companies are outsourcing their supply chain management. Beltmann feels ready to take on this increase in demand and have started offering new and innovative services to their customers.

Beltmann Integrated Logistics' Laura Aiuppa says, "We want to be true innovators for our clients, making sure we research how they can be most efficient. We are able to manage their freight in such a way that they never find themselves over stocked. Our goal is to offer our expert services at an affordable rate, which is why we encourage everyone to click here for a free quote."

It is believed that the reason for growth in third party logistics, or 3PL, is due to the massive nationwide trucker shortage. Because there simply aren't enough truckers anymore to meet demand, businesses are having to turn to 3PLs, also known as freight brokers, as these still have close relationships with the truckers that are out there.

But just what is 3PL? Laura Aiuppa explains: "Essentially, we are a company that provides an outsourced logistic service for every element of our customers' supply chain management. We specialize in all areas of 3PL, including transportation, warehousing, and operation, and integrate all these into a customizable, manageable and affordable service."

The customization options look at the market conditions at the time. This includes the delivery service requirements and other demands that exist for the products and materials of customers. In addition to physical logistics, a number of value-added services are also included, which is what actually integrates the supply chain itself. This includes such things as the actual procurement of goods, for instance.

By integrating these services, Beltmann Integrated Logistics becomes a third party supply chain management provider. Generally, however, they target more particular functions within supply management. This includes such things as raw material provision, transportation and warehousing. Beltmann hopes that more businesses will be encouraged to request a free quote and see how they can improve their services by outsourcing.
