June 29, 2015 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

United Kingdom based company, Adodo Consultancy Services Limited, has announced that reputation marketing should be at the center of all the different marketing outlets utilized by a business, and they want to explain why. The company believes that implementing this process opens doors to the possibilities of customer surveys, video ads, and other online assets, which work together to build a better brand and bolster a superb reputation. They have said the following regarding this concept: "We find that most organizations get referrals in one way or another. The challenge these days is that the first thing 90% of them do is go online and look for additional social proof. So you see, if they don't get that social proof the strength of the referral is diminished. They may never even call."

In 2012 Berkely University carried out a study on reputation. Researchers followed reviews and rankings left on a rating website to find that even so much as half of a star boost in ratings could create as much as 19% more traffic and revenue for a restaurant during their peak hours of operation. Additional research on the subject found similar results in other areas of business, some of which has been published in the Economic Journal. A more recent study carried out by Real Strategic Inc. found that up to 87% of customers who left a bad review would consider changing it to a good review if the company took some form of action. Companies have to be more pro-active. "Every interaction with your customer is an opportunity to grow your reputation. It is not natural for customers to give you reviews and feedback, you have to ask for them. Every aspect of your online marketing depends on your reputation. There is no point in spending money on pay per click for example, if what prospects see is a bad review."

Tim Glynn, Managing Director explains: "We can facilitate the syndication of your reviews to all major social sites in video and text form to ensure they are visible everywhere."
