DESTIN, Fla.- Amid the pandemic, travel advisors find themselves having to become fast experts in health and safety. Have Travel Memories, a luxury travel agency in Destin, FL, is explaining the details of what has brought about this new responsibility.

Travel advisors are not only responsible for putting together wonderful vacations that will fulfill the client's wishes, but they also must be able to answer any questions the clients may have in regard to their trip. This deems it necessary for travel advisors to become knowledgeable of every element composing the client's travel plans.

During this time, COVID-19 affects almost every aspect of life in some way, with the travel industry being far from the exception. Because of this, the top questions whirling around in a traveler's mind tend to relate to the coronavirus and how their traveling experience will be affected by it.

A few main concerns that potential travelers currently have include: whether or not they will be allowed to travel to their desired location, what measures their hotel or resort is taking to keep guests safe, whether or not there is a quarantine requirement upon arriving at their desired state or country, the requirements they will face in order to travel (whether they need to get tested for the virus before departing), exactly which attractions and sight-seeing options are available and whether or not it is even safe for them to travel in the first place.

Each of these concerns will inevitably be brought straight to travel advisors, making it vital that travel companies keep their advisors up to date on the ever-changing, complex health and safety policies of each travel destination. In order to accomplish this, travel companies and advisors must pay close attention to which information sources are reliable. Checking these sources constantly for changes has become routine.
