Canadian Immigration Podcast, a business in Lethbridge, Alberta, Canada, that helps people with their immigration applications, has released a number of podcasts that help answer questions on immigration to Canada. Their Express Entry : Educational Credential Assessments (ECA) podcast is particularly interesting, as it explains whether or not a partner should also get an ECA in order to increase the points for application.

"Immigrating to Canada is a complex procedure that involves a number of different tests and requirements," says Mark Holthe from Canadian Immigration Podcast. "As an ex-immigration officer myself, I have firsthand knowledge of the various rules and elements within the application process. I regularly hear the same questions, so I have released several specific podcasts that deal with the most pertinent questions. More information is also covered in great detail on my website. Alternatively, people can contact me to have their questions answered."

Canadian Immigration Podcast recommends that people do a lot of research before they start with the application process for immigration. The process is long and can be expensive, so it is important to be fully prepared and have all necessary information at hand before embarking on the process. This is something that is covered in great detail in the podcast Express Entry: Is your position eligible? This information will show people whether or not they stand a chance of entering, thereby ensuring they do not waste their time and money.

Another podcast, Express Entry: Employer Reference Letters, discusses other important issues. "Sometimes, people are unable to get a reference letter from their employer," adds Mark Holthe. "This is not always because they performed badly as an employee either. An employer may, for instance, hold a grudge towards their employee because they want to move to Canada. My podcast answers all the necessary questions about what to do in these types of situations."

Canadian Immigration Podcast covers all the important elements of an application for immigration into Canada. Prospective applicants are encouraged to take all the information in and to ask further questions if needed.
