November 05, 2020 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

PermaKill Exterminating Co., LLC, a company based in Flanders, NJ, has announced that they are offering rodent control service in Flanders and neighboring areas. Having rodents like mice and rats in the home is not just a health hazard, they can also cause damage to the home because they like to chew on wires, wood, and other materials. This can result in structural damage and may even cause a fire due to the damaged insulation of electrical wirings. At least 20 percent of fires in the US with undetermined cause were actually due to electrical wire damage by pests.

PermaKill uses a three-step pest control process. The first step is for the client to give them a call, informing them about the mice and rodent problem. People can go to their website and schedule an appointment or simply call them on the phone. The second step is for them to send pest control technicians to the home to assess the situation. They will then inform the client about their findings and recommend a solution for the specific problem.

If the client agrees to the pest control method and the price, they may perform the extermination process within the same day as the inspection. They will make sure that the pest control solution they will use will not harm the home nor the health of the occupants, while also being fast and thorough. After completing the extermination process, they will provide aftercare tips and schedule a follow-up inspection or removal to treat the area again if needed. Those who would like to learn more about the pest control company may want to follow their Facebook page.

They want homeowners to know that pest control starts with getting rid of those things that increase the chances of having an infestation. Mice and rats are attracted to homes that have food, including pet feed, lying in various places. Thus, ensuring good sanitation will reduce the chances of having mice and rats in the house. Ensuring that water sources and food are not readily available for them can prevent rodents from invading a home.

It is also a good idea to regularly check the attic, basement, and other uninhabited areas for signs of infestation. These signs could be droppings around food and water sources. Or these could be signs of nests or nesting materials, such as paper, wood, or fabric. Chewed on food containers and packaging can also indicate the presence of mice or rats. There could also be chewed holes on furniture, walls, and personal belongings. There could also be noises like scurrying and scratching within the walls or in the ceiling.

PermaKill Exterminating Co. combines integrated pest control with their extermination service. They will make use of a variety techniques and tools to provide a successful pest removal for homes in New Jersey. They combine both non-chemical and chemical control methods for effective mice and rat control. For example, they can use strategic baiting and snap placement to get rid of mice and rats. The use of snaps can reduce the population of mice and rats in home fast, while reducing the chances of these pests dying inside the walls. Using strategically positioned traps, they may be able to catch as many rodents as possible. In just one day, homeowners may notice the mice and rat population declining. After a week, the pest technicians may return to the home to catch with bait any remaining rodents.

They want to point out that the extermination service they provide is an effective way of eliminating mice and rats in the home. However, there is a possibility that they may return every year. That is why they offer a rodent control renewal plan for those who require rodent control during the fall and winter seasons.
