Pickens County, Ala. - In the recent election, California voters voted on Proposition 25, which would rid the state entirely of its cash bail system. Along with others in the bail bonds industry, Alabama Bail Bonds kept a close watch on this particular proposition, as it would drastically affect California's jail system. In the end, voters turned down Proposition 25.

If this proposition would have been passed, bail money would no longer be required for a defendant to be released from jail while awaiting trial. The intent was to make it so that judges solely determine whether an inmate should be released or not. They would make this decision based on the risk level the defendant brings to public safety, as well as whether the defendant is considered a flight risk.

In recent years, there has been a big push for bail reform. Many people believe that the current system is more difficult for the poor, creating an unfair advantage for higher-income individuals. On the flip side, others believe that bail reform would cause discrimination to take place because the judge gets to solely decide who does and does not get to be released from jail. The bail industry has been watching this battle on high alert, as a bail reform could put them out of business. Whatever happens, financial stakes are high, as new regulations will continue to be proposed to make both sides happy.
