Celebrities have long been trendsetters and the one sure way for a new trend or hobby to gain mass attention, and this has happened with gardening. Recently, celebrities have been seen gardening, which is causing a spike in the number of consumers who also want to grow their own foods. With this trend, Miami, Florida based Miami Grind has also observed that their herb grinder is rising in popularity as people are looking for a way to grind the dried spices and herbs they have harvested from their gardens in a convenient way.

Elio Constanza, spokesperson for Miami Grind, states, "Celebrities are seen everywhere these days buying gardening supplies or in their gardens digging around. It's a trend that is quickly catching on, and one that consumers are finding enjoyable and healthy."

Gardeners often harvest herbs and spices, which need to be ground after they have been dried. "People want to do what celebrities do," states Elio Constanza. "If Martha Stewart is telling you that freshly dried herbs are the best, then you'll want to dry your own herbs."

Organic living has really caught on in Hollywood over the past few years, and consumers are just as likely to be seen drying their own herbs as those favored celebrities. From cabbage and cauliflower to rosemary, thyme, and a number of peppers and spices, celebrity gardens contain just about any vegetable or herb you could imagine.

Elio Constanza says, "If a celebrity is going to have an impact on what consumers do, then by all means, let it be something that is really healthy for them." She notes that there are a number of top celebrities who have all taken up herb gardening. Among them, aside from Martha Stewart, are Julia Roberts, Prince Charles, Nicole Kidman, Jake Gyllenhaal, Suzanne Somers, and Oprah Winfrey.
