"Water damage can strike your home or company at any time from tornadoes, floods, pipes bursting, roof collapses, sprinkler system discharges, or the water from the fire hoses that put out a fire," says Kevin Finn, owner of St. Louis Cleaning & Restoration. "The risk of mold developing is high if a water damage restoration process is not implemented quickly. There are various negative effects of the water that gets into the home due to flooding. These include: structural damage; sharp glasses and metals; sanitary hazards and diseases from standing water; electrical damage and risks; defunct drainage and sewage systems; cut off communications; contaminated drinking water; and more.

Water can weaken structural elements, particularly those made of wood and similar materials. At the same time, mold and mildew can grow quickly, especially in Missouri where summers are hot and long. The conditions are conducive for molds and mildew. Mold produces spores that can get airborne and when this happens, they could be cause irritation in people who are sensitive to them. The wooden parts of the home that are submerged in water can start to rot and possibly weaken, which can be dangerous for the entire home and the family residing in it.

There is also the danger of electrical shock, which means it is may be necessary to have the power supply cut off. But this means, there would be no electric power for the home to provide power for appliances and other electrical devices. And dirty water poses health hazards, which means family members may have to stay away from the home for the time being. That is why prompt cleaning and restoration services need to be done.

St. Louis Cleaning & Restoration is ready to provide fast and efficient cleaning and restoration services for homes and buildings damaged by flooding. With over 21 years of practical experience, their cleaning and restoration technicians have kept a track record for exceptional customer service and satisfaction. They are available 24 hours a day and every day of the week for such kind of emergencies, and they can quickly bring their advanced drying and monitoring equipment to the home or commercial building and begin by stabilizing the environment, and then concentrate on sanitizing, deodorizing, and handling repairs.

They will remove the water and inspect the damage done so that those that can be salvaged will be cleaned and repaired as quickly as possible and restore them to their previous condition. This will be done for the parts of the home and the precious belongings of the family, such as furniture and other items. This will minimize the damage caused by the flooding on the home and the various things inside. They have moisture meters that show them where most of the damage occurred. They will also help the homeowner and other property owners on making an insurance claim.
