Tallahassee, FLA. - A local Tallahassee plumbing company says many professions, including plumbing, manufacturing, and auto repair, are in dire need of workers; however, there has been a decline in applicants.

High school classes used to offer home economics, welding, and other hands-on classes for students to find interest in, however, it seems with the push of college and corporate jobs hands-on positions have become look down upon by mean of entering the workforce. It is still true that hands-on workers are perceived badly, despite the high technological advancements on equipment that costs $40,000.

Many hands-on job opportunities are thought to be dirty jobs, many not realizing with the advancement of technology allows jobs such as plumbing to be less dirty and more technical. This misconception is the driving force behind the high demands for plumbers and other hands-on workers. There are few skilled technicians in today's companies. Welding, electrical, HVAC, and plumbing are among the trades affected by this problem. There is a need for skilled workers, but no one is available to do the jobs.

Although positions in the trades are frequently overlooked, insiders describe them as the best-kept secret. A significant portion of trade workers in hands-on industries pay off their college tuition. Additionally, workers who join the industry are able to make substantially more than corporate positions, especially with the increased demand. Hands-on positions will always be needed in society.
