VinousQ is proud to announce that they have released a wine and bottle opener that is designed to address the commonly experienced problems with the waiters' corkscrew. This tool has been ensured to be long lasting and easy to use but what they want to emphasize is that it is able to solve three problems often encountered with the commonly used cork screw.

"The waiters corkscrew uses a jagged leg as the fulcrum for leverage," says a representative from VinousQ. "The fulcrum can be tricky to properly position at best, and can easily snap the wine bottle when too much pressure is applied. The positioning of the fulcrum may require more than one attempt at drilling through the cork. This can create instability in the cork. Also, anyone who is not practiced in using the waiter's corkscrew can break the neck of the wine bottle. This may leave a mess of broken glass for cleanup, and worse yet, leave cuts as a result of the broken glass."

Waiters have reported other issues with a standard corkscrew model. These include the fact that cork pulling is laborious and potentially dangerous. Furthermore, the presence of the blade on standard corkscrews means that people cannot put the device in their luggage as it won't pass TSA inspection.

The VinousQ wing corkscrew specifically eliminates all of the above issues. "Our wing corkscrew does not use a fulcrum for leverage, instead using a dual wing leverage system for cork removal," adds the company representative. "Therefore, there is no danger of snapping the wine bottle, and there is no need to physically wrestle with the cork either. The dual lever system of the wing corkscrew does all the work. In addition, the auger of the VinousQ opener is also quite sharp. The user only needs to drill through the cork once. Lastly, the VinousQ corkscrew does not possess a blade. Hence, people may bring along the wine opener when traveling by plane."

The wine opener has been very positively received since having been released on the market. It is expected that this popularity will continue.
