First of all, house cleaning will kill germs, including the Covid-19 virus. It is important to note that germs can also be spread through various things in the home that are frequently touched by people, such as door knobs, cabinet pulls, telephone, tables, chairs, faucet handles, countertops, etc. Practically any surface touched by people can harbor germs. All kinds of germs on such surfaces are eliminated by wiping and by using a disinfectant.

Second, cleaning a home minimizes dust, pollen, and other airborne particles that can irritate the sinuses. This can be helpful for people with allergies, especially those with asthma. Dusting, wet mopping, and vacuuming can be used to get rid of the dust, dirt, and other unwanted particles in the home. HEPA filters may also be used to get rid of approximately 99 percent of the dust and allergens in the air.

Third, home cleaning can save money. Appliances, such as refrigerators and air conditioners, that get too dirty are likely to be less efficient and to have their lifespan reduced. Thus, even if one has to hire professional cleaners, savings can be achieved in the long run.

Fourth, having a clean home, especially the bedroom and the sheets, can result into having a better night's sleep. This was revealed by the National Sleep Foundation, noting that a room smelling fresh with high indoor air quality, a room that is tidy and not cluttered, and bed sheets that are clean and smell fresh can help people sleep better.

And finally, there would be less chances for mold growth in the home. Some molds are toxic and can cause allergic reactions and asthma attacks for some people. Ensuring that the house is cleaned regularly, especially the bathroom and kitchen, ensuring that floors and walls are dry can decrease the possibility of having toxic mold in the home. Aside from being a threat of health, mold can also produce unpleasant smells and ugly black stains on walls, floors, and ceilings.
