Lawsuit Filed Against New York-Presbyterian Hospital and Weill Cornell Medicine Alleging Sexual Abuse by Physician

March 04, 2025

NEW YORK, NY - March 04, 2025 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

New York, NY ? A lawsuit has been filed in the Supreme Court of the State of New York by Plaintiff John Doe against Defendants Darius A. Paduch, M.D., The New York-Presbyterian Hospital, and Weill Cornell Medicine. The lawsuit alleges that Dr. Paduch, while employed by the hospital and medical school, sexually abused and exploited the plaintiff during medical consultations.

The complaint asserts that Dr. Paduch, a licensed physician specializing in urology, engaged in inappropriate and illicit conduct under the guise of providing medical treatment. The lawsuit claims that the institutions failed to protect the plaintiff from foreseeable harm and did not adequately supervise Dr. Paduch, allowing him to exploit his position of authority. Additionally, the lawsuit accuses the institutions of failing to implement necessary safeguards, such as proper background checks, oversight, and reporting procedures, which could have prevented such misconduct.

The legal action is filed under the Victims of Gender-Motivated Violence Protection Law, which provides a civil cause of action for individuals claiming injury from crimes of violence motivated by gender. The plaintiff seeks compensatory and punitive damages for the emotional and psychological distress suffered as a result of the alleged abuse. The complaint details how the plaintiff endured significant trauma, leading to lasting mental and emotional harm.

Attorney Thomas Giuffra, Esq. - The Abuse Lawyer NY of Rheingold Giuffra Ruffo & Plotkin LLP, representing the plaintiff, stated:

"This lawsuit seeks to hold accountable those who failed in their duty to protect patients from abuse and to ensure a safe environment for medical treatment. Healthcare institutions must prioritize patient safety and ensure that no individual in their care is subjected to abuse by a trusted medical professional. The failure to act on warning signs and properly supervise Dr. Paduch contributed to the suffering of our client and likely many others."

The lawsuit underscores the urgent need for stringent oversight and protective measures within medical institutions to prevent such incidents and safeguard patient welfare. It raises concerns about the responsibilities of hospitals and medical schools in preventing misconduct and ensuring that patients are not vulnerable to abuse from medical professionals entrusted with their care.

Dr. Paduch has faced mounting allegations of misconduct, with multiple victims coming forward claiming similar patterns of abuse during medical examinations. This case sheds light on the broader issue of sexual abuse within the medical community and the importance of institutional accountability in preventing and addressing such cases.

The sexual assault allegations against Dr. Paduch follow a troubling pattern seen in various high-profile medical abuse cases, reinforcing the need for stronger institutional safeguards. Medical professionals hold a unique position of trust, and when that trust is violated, it can have devastating consequences for patients. The plaintiff's legal team argues that proper oversight mechanisms, including mandatory background checks, patient feedback systems, and stringent supervisory measures, must be implemented to prevent such egregious violations from occurring in the future.

Legal experts emphasize that hospitals and medical schools must adopt robust policies, including mandatory reporting, enhanced vetting of medical personnel, and comprehensive patient protection protocols, to prevent future instances of abuse. Survivors of medical abuse often struggle with long-term emotional and psychological distress, making it crucial for institutions to take proactive steps to prevent similar incidents.

Beyond the immediate legal proceedings, the case has sparked broader discussions about patient safety, ethical medical practices, and the necessity of implementing systemic reforms in medical institutions. Advocates for abuse survivors stress the importance of transparency, accountability, and survivor-centered policies to create safer healthcare environments. Institutions that fail to prioritize patient safety must be held accountable to prevent further harm.
