A Minnesota based company has taken over premium pet food manufacturer Wyldlife Pets. The company states that all of their products are now chemical free and raised without hormones or antibiotics. Dan Fernandez, new owner of the company states, "We are very excited about the company going forward."

Fernandez says that the company's free range bully sticks have always been a popular product, and that he fully expects them to become more popular when word gets out about their new hormone free makeup. "People don't want their pets eating unhealthy foods any more than they want to eat them personally," Fernandez states. "We wouldn't offer anything to our customers that we wouldn't feed to our own pets."

The company states that their line of natural dog treats are now made from only 100 percent USDA approved grass fed cattle, and that they are made for all breeds of dogs, small and large. Their line of products includes dog chews, and the company states that new products may be released in the future.

Fernandez says that the health benefits of natural beef are many. Beef from grass fed cows is safer for pets to digest than chemically processed chews. The company states that the tendons in the beef also help to promote healthy cartilage in canine joints, and that they can help to floss dogs' teeth while they chew, which in turn promotes healthier teeth and gums.

Natural Chews from Wyldlife Pets are all chemical free and made from beef obtained from cows that were raised without antibiotics or other harmful hormones, which are often found in dog chews. The company is offering a 100 percent money back guarantee on their line of products, which Fernandez states is sure to prompt pet owners to try them.

"We just feel that once they do, they'll be as hooked as their little furry friends," Fernandez states.

Those interested in learning more about the company's new ownership or the line of products that they offer can find more information on their official website. The line of dog chews is also currently being offered on the Amazon marketplace.
