

Weinstein Firm Details Rideshare Trip Data Preservation Risk

August 18, 2026

Atlanta, Georgia - August 18, 2026 -

The Weinstein Firm has issued guidance describing an evidence-preservation challenge facing Uber and Lyft accident victims in Georgia, noting that the digital records used to determine which insurance coverage applies after a rideshare crash may become inaccessible soon after impact.

The firm reports that trip details visible in the Uber and Lyft apps ? including driver name, photo, vehicle information, trip route, pickup and drop-off times, and the fare receipt ? can be refreshed or removed from the passenger-facing app in the period following a collision. This app-level information is distinct from the server-side GPS logs held by the companies. According to the firm's account of its casework, victims who do not save or screenshot their trip details shortly after a crash may lose the most readily accessible record of which insurance coverage period applied at the moment of impact. The firm cites its own case-handling experience as the basis for these observations and recommends that clients treat app-level data as time-sensitive.

Formal legal preservation letters sent to Uber and Lyft after a crash create an obligation to retain server-side GPS records, driver activity logs, trip status data, and communications. Based on its experience handling rideshare claims, the firm states that response times differ by company, with Lyft's internal data request process generally taking longer than Uber's. The firm notes that these timelines are drawn from its own case observations rather than published company standards, and cautions that they may vary by matter. Additional information for those seeking a Weinstein Atlanta rideshare accident lawyer is available through the firm's website.

Georgia Senate Bill 68, signed April 21, 2025, adds a procedural factor. The law permits a defendant to file a motion to stay discovery. The firm distinguishes that procedural stay, which pauses the litigation discovery process, from any independent legal duty a party may have to preserve potentially relevant evidence once litigation is reasonably anticipated. The firm's position is that a discovery stay does not extinguish a preservation obligation, but that the interaction between a stay and ordinary data retention practices can narrow the practical window in which certain records remain available.

That digital evidence is central to the coverage-period determination that defines how much insurance is available. Georgia rideshare policies operate in three tiers described by the firm as Period 1 (app on, no ride accepted), Period 2 (en route to pickup), and Period 3 (passenger in vehicle), with differing liability limits at each tier. The firm states that the same app-status data affected by data retention practices is the evidence used to establish which period applied.

"A discovery stay under SB 68 pauses the litigation process, but it does not erase a party's separate obligation to preserve relevant evidence," said Michael Weinstein, Managing Partner of The Weinstein Firm. "The concern is timing. In our experience, some server-side records that establish the coverage period can advance through routine retention cycles while procedural matters are pending. That is why the firm's response protocol begins with app screenshot instructions to the client within the first hour after a crash is reported, before any formal legal process starts. The most critical evidence often exists in the victim's own phone before the app refreshes."

Georgia's modified comparative fault standard permits recovery as long as a victim is found less than 50 percent at fault. The firm observes that in rideshare crashes, insurance adjusters may raise both the coverage-period dispute and app-status ambiguity to challenge coverage and assign partial fault before the digital evidence is secured. The firm states that its practice is to send preservation demands the same day a crash is reported. Guidance from an Atlanta rideshare accident lawyer on evidence preservation is described in the firm's published materials on their website.
