

Rowntree Montessori School Publishes Resources on Early Learning Approach

August 18, 2026

August 18, 2026 -

Rowntree Montessori School has published a set of resources describing how the Montessori approach is applied in its early childhood classrooms, along with a schedule of workshops and information sessions for parents.

The school said the materials were assembled in response to questions raised during enrolment inquiries and parent conferences. Administrators said families frequently ask how the method differs from conventional preschool programming in day-to-day practice, and that the resources are intended to address those questions directly.

The materials describe how classroom activities are structured around each child's pace and interests rather than moving a full group through the same sequence. School officials said children select from available activities within a prepared classroom environment, and that instructors observe and guide rather than lead the group through a fixed schedule.

Collaborative activity is also covered in the resources. According to the school, mixed-age classroom grouping is a standard feature of the approach, and the materials describe how older and younger children work together during portions of the day. Officials said this structure affects how instructors plan activities and how classroom space is arranged.

Staff training is addressed as well. The school said its teaching staff complete Montessori-specific preparation, and that the resources explain what that training involves and how it shapes classroom practice. Administrators said questions about instructor qualifications come up regularly during enrolment conversations.

Families evaluating a Montessori preschool in Brampton consider factors including instructional approach, classroom structure, staff credentials and how programs communicate with parents, according to the school. Officials said questions about the differences between approaches have become more common during recent enrolment cycles.

The workshop and information session schedule runs alongside the published materials. School officials said the sessions allow parents to ask questions directly and observe classroom arrangements, and that topics are selected based on what comes up during enrolment inquiries rather than set in advance for the year.

Administrators said sessions are offered at varying times to accommodate different work schedules, with both daytime and evening options available. The school said materials from each session are made available afterward to families who are unable to attend.

Officials said classroom materials are a recurring topic in parent questions, and the resources describe how the physical setup of a Montessori classroom differs from a conventional one. According to the school, materials are arranged so children can access them independently, and the resources explain how that arrangement supports the way activities are chosen during the day.

The school said the resources also address the transition from preschool into later grades. Administrators said parents often ask how children accustomed to selecting their own activities adjust to more structured classrooms, and the materials describe how the school approaches that transition within its own programming.

The school said the resources describe its own practice rather than making comparative claims about outcomes. Officials said families researching early childhood options encounter a range of claims about different approaches, and that the materials were written to describe what happens in the classroom and leave evaluation to parents.

Officials said the resources will be reviewed and updated as classroom practice changes. The school said no fixed schedule has been set for revisions, and that updates will be made when there is a substantive change to describe rather than at regular intervals.

Administrators said feedback from families attending the sessions will inform what additional material is published. Officials said several topics have already been identified for future resources based on recurring questions, though publication dates have not been set.

The school said it also plans to review whether the sessions are reaching families at the point in their decision process when the information is most useful. Officials said attendance patterns will be examined at the end of the current enrolment cycle before any changes to scheduling are made.

Families seeking information about a Montessori preschool in Brampton can find the published resources and the session schedule through Rowntree Montessori School.

###

For more information about Rowntree Montessori Schools, contact the company here: Rowntree Montessori Schools
Rowntree Montessori Schools 905-457-7439
admissions@rowntreemontessori.com

Rowntree Montessori Schools

Website: <https://www.rowntreemontessori.com/>

Email: admissions@rowntreemontessori.com

Phone: 905-457-7439