August 18, 2026 -

The Law Office of Steven R. Smith has launched an expanded online resource center covering personal injury law, along with a planned series of informational webinars for Queens residents.

The resource center includes articles and written guidance on topics the firm said come up repeatedly during initial consultations. These include what steps to take immediately after an accident, how injury claims proceed and what documentation matters early in a case. The firm said the material was organized around questions people ask rather than around practice areas.

Steven R. Smith, the founding lawyer, has practiced personal injury law for more than two decades, representing people injured in accidents and through negligence. The firm said the resource center was developed to extend that work into written form, giving people access to general information before they decide whether to consult a lawyer at all.

Topics covered include motor vehicle accidents, slip and fall injuries and premises liability. The firm said each section describes how these cases typically proceed and what factors affect them, without offering advice on individual circumstances. The firm said the material states clearly that outcomes depend on facts specific to each case.

The firm said a portion of the resource center addresses timing. Sections describe filing deadlines under New York law and explain why waiting can affect a case, including how evidence and witness recollection change over time. The firm said questions about deadlines are among the most common it receives.

Another section covers what to expect from the process itself. According to the firm, the material describes stages including investigation, filing, discovery and settlement discussions, along with how long each stage can take. The firm said people often approach a first consultation with expectations shaped by sources that do not reflect how cases actually proceed.

The planned webinar series will cover similar subjects in a format allowing residents to ask questions directly. The firm said scheduling has not been finalized and that topics will be selected based on what draws the most interest from the written material.

People searching for a personal injury lawyer in Queens, NY often begin looking during a difficult period, when medical treatment and insurance communication are already underway. The firm said the resource center is intended to be useful at that stage, whether or not someone goes on to contact the office.

The firm said insurance communication is a recurring subject in the written material. Sections describe what happens when an insurer contacts an injured person directly, what a recorded statement involves, and why people often have questions about responding before speaking with a lawyer. The firm said these questions come up in a majority of first consultations.

Medical documentation is addressed in a separate section. According to the firm, the material describes why treatment records matter to an injury claim and how gaps in treatment can affect a case. The firm said it wrote the section to describe how documentation is used rather than to advise readers on their own treatment decisions.

The firm said the material does not address individual situations and is not a substitute for consulting a lawyer about a specific matter. The firm said this is stated within the resource center itself, since general information cannot account for the facts of a particular case.

The firm said it plans to add material as questions accumulate. No publication schedule has been set, and the firm said sections will be added when there is enough recurring interest in a subject to support one.

The firm said it also intends to review which sections draw the most attention and use that to guide what comes next. Questions submitted through the website will be considered alongside those raised during consultations.

People seeking a personal injury lawyer in Queens, NY can find the resource center and information about the Law Office of Steven R. Smith through the firm's website.
