

Law Office of Steven R. Smith Expands Personal Injury Practice

August 18, 2026

August 18, 2026 -

The Law Office of Steven R. Smith has expanded its personal injury practice, adding capacity to handle a wider range of injury matters for Queens residents and publishing resources on how injury claims proceed under New York law.

The firm said the expansion follows an increase in inquiries over the past year. Matters have included motor vehicle collisions, workplace injuries and incidents involving property conditions. The firm said the added capacity is intended to shorten the time between an initial inquiry and a first consultation.

Steven R. Smith, the founding lawyer, has practiced personal injury law for over two decades and handles matters ranging from vehicle collisions to workplace injuries. The firm said the expansion allows it to take on additional matters while keeping the same approach to individual case handling, with each matter reviewed directly rather than assigned through a standardized intake process.

Personal injury law changes as legislation and court decisions accumulate, and the firm said it publishes articles and analysis covering developments that affect claims in New York. According to the firm, this material describes what has changed and how it applies generally, without offering guidance on individual situations.

The firm said its published resources also cover the period immediately following an injury. Sections describe what documentation matters, why timing affects a claim, and what happens when an insurer makes contact directly. The firm said questions on these subjects account for a large share of what comes up during first consultations.

Insurance negotiation is addressed in a separate portion of the material. According to the firm, the resources describe how liability is established, what an insurer typically requests, and how disputes over responsibility arise. The firm said the material describes the process rather than predicting how any particular claim will resolve.

Someone looking for a personal injury lawyer in Queens, NY is often doing so while still receiving medical treatment and managing communication with an insurer. The firm said the resources are written with that timing in mind, and are meant to be useful whether or not a reader goes on to contact the office.

The firm said case handling includes settlement discussion and, where discussion does not produce a resolution, litigation. According to the firm, whether a matter proceeds to court depends on the facts and on what an insurer is prepared to offer, and this is discussed with clients at the outset rather than after a matter is underway.

The firm said it does not make predictions about outcomes during consultations. Officials at the firm said case results depend on facts, evidence and applicable law, and that the resources state this directly rather than describing what a claim might be worth.

Filing deadlines are covered in the material as well. According to the firm, New York sets time limits for injury claims that vary by the type of matter and the parties involved, and the resources describe those limits in general terms while advising readers to confirm how they apply to their own situation.

The firm said it plans to add resources as recurring questions accumulate. No publication schedule has been set, and material will be added when there is sufficient interest in a subject to support it.

Anyone seeking a personal injury lawyer in Queens, NY can find these resources and information about the Law Office of Steven R. Smith on their website.

The material published by the firm is general information and is not a substitute for consulting a lawyer about a specific matter.
