All Pro Thornton Deck Builders Expands Service to Welby

October 01, 2026

THORNTON, CO - October 01, 2026 -
All Pro Thornton Deck Builders has extended its residential deck design and construction service area to include Welby, an unincorporated community in Adams County, Colorado, giving homeowners there direct access to a contractor already operating across the northern Denver metropolitan area. The expansion takes effect immediately and covers new deck construction, replacement, and repair for single-family properties throughout the community.

Welby sits just south of Thornton along the Interstate 25 and Interstate 76 corridors and forms part of the Denver?Aurora?Lakewood metropolitan area. The community recorded a population of 15,553 in the 2020 United States census, with a housing mix of established single-family neighborhoods, newer residential development, and open space. Many of those homes were built decades ago, creating steady demand for deck replacement and structural repair alongside new outdoor construction.

The expanded coverage brings the company's existing scope of work to Welby addresses without changes to its standards or process. That scope includes custom deck design, ground-level and elevated deck construction, railing and stair installation, and the use of pressure-treated wood, cedar, and composite decking materials selected according to each property and budget. The company also handles the local building-permit process required for deck projects in unincorporated Adams County.

David Miller, owner of All Pro Thornton Deck Builders, said the decision followed repeated inquiries from residents outside the company's earlier service boundaries. "The expansion answers direct requests from Welby homeowners who wanted a contractor familiar with local conditions and county requirements," said Miller. "The same design, permitting, and construction standards applied across Thornton will now be available to property owners in the Welby area."

Deck projects in unincorporated Adams County generally require a building permit when a structure exceeds a set height or is attached to a dwelling, and inspections are conducted at defined stages of construction. Handling that permitting locally is intended to reduce delays and help ensure that finished decks meet county code. The company coordinates permit applications and inspection scheduling as part of each project rather than leaving those steps to the homeowner.

Welby's location near the Regional Transportation District's N Line commuter rail and its proximity to employment centers along the northern Denver corridor have contributed to residential investment in the surrounding area. Local planning documents from Adams County have identified the community as a mix of single-family homes, multifamily housing, and commercial and industrial uses. That combination has produced a base of established properties where deck additions and replacements are common home-improvement projects.

The move reflects broader residential growth across the region. Adams County recorded 519,572 residents at the 2020 census, and state estimates placed its 2025 population above 554,000. Thornton, where the company is based, recorded roughly 141,867 residents in 2020, an increase of more than nineteen percent over the previous decade. Rising household numbers across these adjacent communities have supported ongoing demand for outdoor living space.

Colorado's Front Range climate, marked by intense sun exposure, temperature swings, and occasional heavy snow, places particular demands on outdoor structures. Different decking materials carry distinct maintenance and durability profiles under those conditions, a factor the company weighs during design consultations. Proper flashing, footing depth, and drainage also affect how a deck withstands the freeze-and-thaw cycles common to the region.

For Welby homeowners, the change means that quotes, site evaluations, and scheduling are now available through the same channels used by existing customers in Thornton and neighboring areas. The company provides written estimates before work begins and outlines materials, timelines, and warranty terms for each project. Additional information on the expanded deck construction services is available through the company's website.

The expansion does not involve new physical locations or staffing announcements, and the company will continue to operate from its current base while serving Welby addresses. Seasonal scheduling in Colorado typically concentrates deck construction in the spring, summer, and early autumn months, when weather conditions favor outdoor building work.
