KEY BISCAVNE, FL - August 26, 2026 -

Parent Your Parents is highlighting its coordinated long-term care planning services for Fort Lauderdale families facing changes in care needs, housing decisions, insurance questions, benefits eligibility, and responsibilities involving older loved ones.

Parent Your Parents helps families better understand the resources, decisions, and transitions that can accompany aging. The firm helps organize the practical and legal considerations when an aging parent or spouse begins to need more support. These situations may involve assessing in-home assistance, considering a move or downsizing, reviewing insurance and benefits, and preparing future decision-making documents.

For families in Fort Lauderdale and surrounding South Florida communities, long-term care planning may require attention to several matters at once. A parent's ability to complete daily activities, the safety of a current home, the availability of relatives to assist, existing Medicare or insurance coverage, and estate planning documents can all affect the options a family considers. Parent Your Parents helps families assess these needs and identify next steps.

Another key part of long-term care planning is reviewing financial and legal documents early. Insurance policies, private long-term care coverage, Medicare, and public benefit programs shape a family's choices. Many families only learn about policy benefits or coverage gaps after a health crisis occurs.

The firm's senior concierge services include evaluating in-home needs and alternatives such as downsizing or assisted living. When a residential move becomes necessary, Parent Your Parents can help families review options and coordinate planning for a home sale and moving-related concerns. The company also notes that care decisions can be especially difficult when one member of a couple needs substantially more assistance than the other.

Parent Your Parents' approach to Fort Lauderdale long-term care planning also considers activities of daily living in care-related decision-making. These activities can include bathing, dressing, personal hygiene, toileting, mobility, and transferring. Understanding how an older adult is managing these functions can help families prepare for discussions with care providers and other professionals involved in determining available support.

Legal preparation is another part of the planning conversation. Through its Florida elder law practice, Parent Your Parents provides legal services involving Medicaid planning, estate planning, wills, trusts, probate and estate administration, trust administration, and powers of attorney, including durable powers of attorney. These services help families examine whether existing arrangements reflect present circumstances and whether additional planning may be appropriate.

Medicaid-related planning can require advance consideration because eligibility rules, asset-transfer rules, and look-back requirements may affect available options. The company's services help families understand issues that may require legal or financial attention while coordinating caregiving and residential transitions.

The firm also assists families with reviewing assisted living options. Parent Your Parents does not accept referral fees or other compensation from assisted living communities for those recommendations. This structure keeps the focus on the needs and circumstances of the family evaluating care options. In addition to care coordination, the company may help families consider home modifications for aging in place, household downsizing, and the sale or disposition of household belongings.

Families often encounter several decisions at the same time when a parent's needs change," said H. Frances Reaves, Esq., of Parent Your Parents. "The planning process can involve care, housing, benefits, legal documents, and family communication. Bringing those considerations into one coordinated conversation can help families understand what needs attention and what resources may be available."

Founded by Reaves based on her personal caregiving experience, Parent Your Parents serves families in Fort Lauderdale and surrounding South Florida communities, providing guidance related to aging, caregiving, elder law, benefits, and transitions in living arrangements.
