Bucket City Deck Contractors Expands Deck Design Services to Brentwood

October 13, 2026

Murfreesboro, TN - October 13, 2026 -
Bucket City Deck Contractors has widened its custom deck design and construction service area to include Brentwood, Tennessee, extending coverage from an established base in Rutherford County north into Williamson County. The change gives Brentwood homeowners local access to deck design, installation, and repair from a contractor already active across the Nashville metropolitan area.

The expansion connects two neighboring markets separated by roughly a half-hour drive. Brentwood, a Williamson County suburb south of Nashville, is known for larger residential lots and established neighborhoods, conditions that often support demand for backyard construction. The added territory keeps the company's footprint concentrated in the Middle Tennessee counties surrounding Nashville rather than spread thinly across the state.

Interest in outdoor living space has grown across much of the country in recent years, and the Nashville region has followed that pattern. Decks function as an extension of interior living areas, providing room for dining, seating, and gatherings without a full home addition. Spring and summer typically mark the busiest stretch for deck construction in Middle Tennessee, when milder weather supports both building and outdoor use.

The expanded coverage includes the full scope of work the company handles elsewhere. That work spans custom deck design, new construction in wood and composite materials, multi-level layouts, railings and stairs, and repair or replacement of aging structures. Projects typically begin with an on-site consultation and a design phase before construction, allowing dimensions, materials, and finishes to be settled in advance.

Timelines for a deck project vary with size, material, and permitting, but a typical residential build moves from consultation to design approval and then to construction over a period of weeks. Weather, material lead times, and inspection scheduling can each affect the calendar. A defined design phase ahead of construction is intended to reduce mid-project changes and keep the build on a set plan.

"The expansion brings full deck design and construction to Brentwood residents who previously had fewer specialized options close to home," said Dave Harris, owner of Bucket City Deck Contractors. "Serving Williamson County alongside Rutherford County reflects steady demand for outdoor living space across the Nashville region."

Material choice remains a central decision for homeowners weighing a new deck. Pressure-treated wood continues to offer a lower initial cost and a traditional appearance, while composite boards, made largely from recycled wood fibers and plastics, require less ongoing upkeep and resist fading, staining, and cracking. Selection often depends on budget, maintenance preferences, and the intended lifespan of the structure.

Industry data indicates that deck construction can return a meaningful share of its cost at resale. According to the Remodeling Impact Report published by the National Association of Realtors, a wood deck built at an estimated cost of about $10,000 recovered roughly $8,000 in value, an approximate 80 percent return. Figures vary by market, materials, and project scope, though the report points to decks as a comparatively efficient exterior improvement.

Broader remodeling activity has leaned toward exterior and outdoor projects in recent years, a shift tied in part to greater time spent at home. Outdoor living additions such as decks, patios, and porches have featured among the exterior projects homeowners pursue for daily use and long-term value. The trend has extended into growing metropolitan areas, including the counties around Nashville where residential development has remained active.

Building in Williamson County also involves local permitting and code requirements, which govern footing depth, railing height, and structural load. A contractor familiar with those standards can help align a project with inspection expectations from the design stage forward. Bucket City Deck Contractors states that its Brentwood projects follow the same construction and permitting practices applied in its existing service areas.
