ArrangingItAll Launches Relocation Service for Older Adults

August 24, 2026

AUSTIN, TX - August 24, 2026 -
ArrangingItAll has launched a relocation service built specifically for older adults, covering downsizing consultation, packing, transport, unpacking, and setup at the destination residence.

The company said the service was developed in response to requests it was already receiving from families arranging moves for aging parents and relatives. Representatives said these moves differ from standard residential relocations in timeline, decision-making and the amount of sorting involved before packing begins.

Downsizing consultation is the component the company said differs most from conventional moving work. Representatives said moves into smaller residences or care communities typically require decisions about which possessions will fit, and that this process often takes longer than the physical move itself. The company said consultations are scheduled separately from packing so decisions are not made under time pressure on moving day.

The service includes setup at the destination, according to the company. Representatives said this covers unpacking, arranging furniture and putting frequently used items within reach, and that the goal is for the residence to be functional the first night rather than after several days of unpacking.

Staff training addresses the physical aspects of these moves, the company said. Representatives said crews are trained in safe handling practices and in working around clients who may have limited mobility, and that job planning accounts for how much of the process a client wants to be present for.

Families arranging moves are often coordinating from other cities, according to the company. Representatives said a significant share of inquiries come from adult children living elsewhere, and that scheduling and updates are structured so someone not present locally can follow the process.

Households searching for senior movers in Austin, TX typically weigh timeline flexibility, whether a company handles sorting and setup, and how physically involved the client will need to be, according to the company.

Representatives said these questions come up in most initial conversations.

Timing is another factor the company said differs from standard moves. Representatives said moves tied to a care community often work against a fixed availability date, while moves to a smaller home allow more flexibility, and that the two are planned differently.

The company said it is offering initial consultations at no cost during the service launch. Representatives said these appointments cover the scope of a prospective move, an estimated timeline and what portions a family may want to handle themselves.

Published resources on the company's website cover the moving process, according to representatives. They said material addressing sorting, timeline planning and what to expect during a downsizing move is being expanded alongside the service launch, with topics drawn from questions families ask during consultations.

Representatives said the company coordinates with care communities where a move involves one. They said facilities often have set move-in windows, elevator reservations and loading requirements, and that confirming those details in advance prevents delays on the day of the move.

The company said it also handles disposition of items a client is not keeping. According to representatives, this includes coordinating donations, arranging estate sale contacts and disposing of remaining items, which they said families frequently underestimate when planning a downsizing move on their own.

Storage arrangements come up in a portion of these moves as well, according to the company. Representatives said families sometimes need to hold items while decisions are pending, and that the company arranges short-term storage rather than requiring those decisions be finalized before the move proceeds.

The company said it plans to review how the service performs before expanding it further. Representatives said scheduling and crew capacity will determine whether additional service areas are added, and that no timeline has been set for that decision.
