August 28, 2026

GARNET VALLEY, PA - August 28, 2026 -
Wenger Remodeling has announced an expanded focus on renovation projects that address accessibility and changing household needs for homeowners planning to remain in their homes as they age. The initiative brings additional attention to design considerations that can support mobility, functionality, and long-term residential use.

Douglas Wenger, owner and principal of Wenger Remodeling, said the company?s focus is intended to help homeowners consider accessibility during the renovation planning process rather than treating it as a separate concern.

?Thoughtful planning can make a significant difference in how a home functions as household needs change,? said Wenger. ?The goal is to consider practical design elements that can support accessibility while maintaining the character and everyday usability of the home.?

The company?s work in aging in place renovations Chester County PA includes consideration of residential features that may become more important as mobility needs change. These can include step-free entrances, wider doorways, accessible bathroom layouts, improved lighting, and adjustments to commonly used areas of the home.

Wenger Remodeling has also published a new resource titled ?Designing Independence: Transformative Strategies in Aging in Place Renovations.? The article examines universal design concepts and provides information about features homeowners may want to consider when evaluating accessibility-related remodeling projects.

The resource covers several areas that can affect how easily a home can be navigated. Entrances, hallways, bathrooms, kitchens, flooring, lighting, and transitions between rooms can all be evaluated during the planning stage. The appropriate improvements can vary depending on the existing structure of the home and the needs of its occupants.

Aging in place does not necessarily require a complete home renovation. Some projects may involve targeted modifications to specific areas, while others may incorporate accessibility considerations into a larger remodeling project already being planned. Addressing these considerations early can give homeowners more opportunities to evaluate different approaches before construction begins.

For homeowners considering accessibility updates, the planning process may begin with an assessment of how the home is currently used. Entry points, stairways, door widths, bathroom configurations, and frequently traveled areas can provide useful starting points for identifying potential improvements. Homeowners can then determine which changes are relevant to their property and priorities.

Wenger Remodeling?s expanded focus also recognizes that accessibility considerations can be incorporated into different types of residential remodeling. Bathroom renovations, kitchen updates, additions, and general home improvements may provide opportunities to address functionality alongside the primary goals of the project.

Depending on the scope of a renovation, homeowners may also consult professionals who specialize in accessibility, mobility, or residential design. Collaboration can help identify potential considerations that may not be immediately apparent during a standard remodeling assessment. The specific professionals involved will depend on the project's requirements and the homeowner?s circumstances.

The newly published resource is intended to provide homeowners with additional information as they research aging-in-place concepts and evaluate potential modifications. It outlines design considerations without suggesting that every feature is appropriate for every residence.

The company?s focus on aging in place renovations Chester County PA provides another area for homeowners to consider when planning residential improvements. Evaluating accessibility alongside factors such as layout, functionality, and long-term usability can help inform renovation decisions based on the characteristics of each property.

Wenger Remodeling will continue providing information about residential remodeling and accessibility considerations through its website and other resources. The company?s latest initiative reflects an effort to provide homeowners with practical information they can review when considering how their homes may accommodate changing needs over time.
