

Resurgence Behavioral Health Publishes New Resource as 2026 Standards Put Drug Rehab Quality Under Greater Scrutiny

September 11, 2026

JURUPA VALLEY, CA - September 11, 2026 -

Resurgence Behavioral Health has published a new educational resource outlining the clinical, regulatory, and operational factors patients and families can consider when evaluating addiction treatment. The article, "What Makes a Quality Drug Rehab Center in California?" addresses licensing, accreditation, qualified clinical staffing, evidence-based treatment, appropriate levels of care, and continuity between detoxification, residential, and outpatient services.

The publication comes as California reports an important shift in its overdose crisis. The California Department of Public Health's 2026 State of Public Health Report states that overdose deaths declined in 2024 after increasing for 14 consecutive years. The report also found that 68.8 percent of drug-related overdose deaths examined across 24 counties had at least one potential opportunity for intervention before or during the fatal overdose. Those findings place renewed attention on access to appropriate treatment and on how patients distinguish clinically structured programs from services that may not offer the same level of oversight.

The issue remains significant in Riverside County. Riverside University Health System reported 674 fatal overdoses in the county during 2024, including 349 deaths involving fentanyl. County public-health officials have continued supporting overdose surveillance, treatment connections, naloxone distribution and recovery services in response to the regional burden.

Against that background, the new Resurgence resource focuses on characteristics that can be verified before admission. California's Department of Health Care Services has sole authority to license residential nonmedical alcohol and drug treatment facilities in the state. DHCS notes that certification can also identify facilities that operate above minimum service requirements and are in substantial compliance with state program standards.

Independent accreditation provides another measure. The Joint Commission currently lists Resurgence Behavioral Health, LLC as an accredited Behavioral Health Care and Human Services organization. Its directory identifies the Resurgence California residential site at 3686 Pacific Avenue in Jurupa Valley as providing clinically managed high-intensity and low-intensity residential substance use disorder services. The Joint Commission states that accredited providers undergo comprehensive reviews at least every 3 years to ensure compliance with national safety and quality standards.

The new article also emphasizes the importance of matching treatment intensity to clinical need. The American Society of Addiction Medicine describes its criteria as a national framework for assessing biomedical, psychological, and social needs and connecting patients with an appropriate level of addiction care. ASAM's current standards call for multidimensional assessment, individualized treatment planning, and regular reassessment as patients progress. Its 2026 Level of Care Certification elements further reinforce the independent validation of treatment program capabilities.

Resurgence Alcohol & Drug Rehab Riverside describes a treatment continuum that includes medical detoxification, inpatient or residential care, outpatient treatment and aftercare. Its Riverside-area information also identifies medication-assisted treatment, individual and group therapy, cognitive behavioral therapy, dialectical behavior therapy, rational emotive behavioral therapy, 12-Step programming, SMART Recovery, family services and treatment for co-occurring mental health conditions.

For people entering a drug rehab near me search in Riverside, the article encourages evaluation beyond proximity. State licensing, independent accreditation, clinical staffing, medical supervision, evidence-based therapies and the specific levels of care available can provide more useful comparison criteria than convenience alone.

The phrase "best drug rehab centers" can produce rankings and promotional claims that do not necessarily reflect a program's clinical capabilities. Patients can instead verify whether a facility has appropriate regulatory credentials, whether its advertised level of care is independently documented, and whether treatment planning accounts for substance use severity, withdrawal risk, psychiatric conditions, and the recovery environment.

Patients researching inpatient drug rehab may require a structured residential environment because of the severity of substance use, relapse risk, or other clinical factors. The Joint Commission independently identifies clinically managed residential services at Resurgence California's Jurupa Valley site, providing third-party confirmation of residential treatment intensity.

Patients appropriate for outpatient drug rehab generally require less continuous supervision while still participating in scheduled clinical services. Resurgence's published treatment information describes outpatient counseling, group sessions, relapse-prevention planning and case management as part of its wider continuum. The organization also describes an intensive outpatient drug rehab (IOP) option for patients who need greater structure than standard outpatient therapy without continuous residential care.

The distinction between treatment settings is increasingly important under current ASAM guidance. The fourth edition of The ASAM Criteria describes levels of care according to setting, staffing, service intensity, and other clinical characteristics. Patients are reassessed during treatment to determine whether they should remain at the current intensity or move to a more or less intensive setting as their needs change.

The resource is relevant to patients and families throughout Riverside and nearby communities, including Rubidoux, Pedley, Glen Avon, Mira Loma, Home Gardens, and La Sierra. Geographic access can affect transportation, family involvement and ongoing participation in outpatient services, but clinical appropriateness remains a separate consideration when choosing treatment.

Resurgence's Riverside-area program also describes care for alcohol, opioid, prescription drug, methamphetamine, cocaine and benzodiazepine use, together with dual-diagnosis services for patients experiencing co-occurring psychiatric conditions. Its published information identifies a 50-bed residential setting and describes registered nurses, licensed vocational nurses, therapists and case managers as members of the treatment team.

Current public health data give the article broader significance. California's decline in overdose deaths represents progress, but state and Riverside County figures continue to document substantial substance-related mortality. The state's finding that many overdose deaths involved an identifiable opportunity for intervention underscores the importance of connecting patients with appropriate services before a medical emergency becomes fatal.

By publishing the new resource, Resurgence Behavioral Health is adding patient-focused guidance to a 2026 discussion shaped by changing overdose trends, updated treatment standards and greater emphasis on independent verification of addiction-treatment services. The article provides patients and families with practical criteria for evaluating licensing, accreditation, clinical staffing, treatment intensity and continuity of care before selecting a rehabilitation program.
