

Compassion Behavioral Health Publishes New Resource Clarifying Integrated Mental Health and Addiction Treatment

September 08, 2026

FORT LAUDERDALE, FL - September 08, 2026 -

Compassion Behavioral Health has published an expanded online resource designed to help patients, families, and referral professionals better understand the relationship between mental health treatment and substance use disorder care. The resource explains how treatment planning can address psychiatric conditions and substance use together rather than approaching each concern separately, while also outlining the levels of care available through Compassion Behavioral Health.

The resource builds on Compassion Behavioral Health's educational article, "Drug Rehab Near Me: Treating Mental Health and Substance Use Together," which discusses the importance of identifying co-occurring mental health conditions when patients enter treatment for alcohol or drug use. The article describes a continuum that may include medical detoxification, residential stabilization, partial hospitalization, intensive outpatient programming, outpatient care, psychiatric services, and evidence-based behavioral therapies depending on clinical need. The organization's Fort Lauderdale location focuses on PHP, IOP, and outpatient services, with coordination available for patients who require detoxification or residential care through its Hollywood treatment location.

The emphasis on treating mental health and substance use together reflects broader clinical guidance. The Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration states that integrated screening and treatment are recommended for people living with co-occurring mental health and substance use disorders. SAMHSA reports that integrated treatment can contribute to improved psychiatric functioning, reduced substance use, better quality of life, greater housing stability, and decreased hospitalization for people with co-occurring conditions.

The scope of the issue is substantial. According to SAMHSA's 2024 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, approximately 21.2 million adults in the United States experienced both a mental illness and a substance use disorder during the previous year. SAMHSA also reported that 6.9 million adults had both a serious mental illness and a substance use disorder in 2024. Among adults with both serious mental illness and substance use disorder, about three in ten received neither substance use treatment nor mental health treatment during that year. These figures demonstrate why access to coordinated behavioral health services remains an important consideration for patients and families evaluating treatment.

Compassion Behavioral Health's Fort Lauderdale resource describes treatment services, including cognitive behavioral therapy, dialectical behavior therapy, eye movement desensitization and reprocessing, motivational interviewing, neurofeedback, solution-focused brief therapy, relapse prevention, individual therapy, and group therapy. Specialty programming described by the provider includes dual diagnosis treatment, family programming, medication-assisted treatment, and services for veterans. The Fort Lauderdale program provides partial hospitalization and intensive outpatient care supported by licensed behavioral health professionals, psychiatric providers, therapists, and other members of the clinical care team.

These treatment levels are also consistent with the broader continuum described by the American Society of Addiction Medicine. The ASAM Criteria use a person-centered assessment process to match patients with an appropriate intensity of addiction care based on medical, psychological, substance-related, and social needs. ASAM identifies outpatient, intensive outpatient or high-intensity outpatient, residential, and inpatient services as broad levels within the addiction treatment continuum. The criteria also emphasize reassessment as patients progress through treatment, so that the intensity of care can adjust to evolving clinical needs.

For patients and families researching luxury drug rehab services in Fort Lauderdale, the expanded website information provides additional context for evaluating what private, clinically focused treatment may entail. Compassion Behavioral Health describes its approach to luxury care as emphasizing privacy, smaller treatment settings, psychiatric involvement, individualized planning, and evidence-based therapy rather than relying only on nonclinical amenities. Its related Fort Lauderdale luxury treatment resource describes PHP, IOP, and outpatient care in a private setting and notes that patients requiring medical detoxification or residential stabilization can be coordinated with the organization's Hollywood program.

The information may also help people comparing luxury alcohol rehab Fort Lauderdale programs, alcohol rehab near me Fort Lauderdale resources, and drug rehab near me Fort Lauderdale services understand the differences among available levels of care. Patients searching for luxury drug rehab centers Fort Lauderdale may require different treatment intensity depending on withdrawal risk, psychiatric symptoms, substance use history, physical health, home environment, and other clinical factors. A luxury designation alone does not determine whether a treatment program is appropriate for a particular patient, making clinical assessment and level-of-care matching important parts of treatment selection.

People researching inpatient drug rehab Fort Lauderdale or inpatient alcohol rehab Fort Lauderdale can also use the resource to distinguish inpatient and residential stabilization from outpatient-based treatment. Compassion Behavioral Health's published location information indicates that its Fort Lauderdale program offers PHP, IOP, outpatient, psychiatric, and dual-diagnosis services. At the same time, medical detox and residential treatment are provided through its nearby Hollywood location. This distinction can help patients and families avoid assuming that every treatment center provides every level of care at a single facility.

The resource is also intended to improve access to treatment information for communities surrounding the Fort Lauderdale facility. Patients and families in Coral Ridge may use the information to compare nearby behavioral health services, while those in Coral Ridge Country Club Estates can review the differences between structured outpatient and more intensive treatment settings before beginning the admissions process. The same information is relevant to residents of Bay Colony and Sea Ranch Lakes seeking mental health, alcohol, or substance use disorder treatment within the broader Fort Lauderdale area.

Residents of Lauderdale-by-the-Sea and Victoria Park can likewise review the program information when evaluating local treatment resources. Compassion Behavioral Health's published materials describe treatment planning that considers psychiatric needs, substance use, trauma history, medication management, family involvement, and the level of structure a patient may require. The objective is to provide patients and families with clearer information before they speak with an admissions or clinical professional about appropriate care.

The newly highlighted resource also places greater emphasis on dual diagnosis treatment. Substance use can occur alongside depression, anxiety disorders, post-traumatic stress disorder, bipolar disorder, and other psychiatric conditions. The National Institute on Drug Abuse identifies behavioral treatment as an important component of care for people with substance use disorders and co-occurring mental illnesses and discusses therapies including cognitive behavioral therapy and other integrated behavioral approaches.

By publishing more detailed information about treatment levels, therapeutic approaches, psychiatric care, and the relationship between substance use and mental health, Compassion Behavioral Health is providing another educational reference for people navigating a complex treatment system. The resource allows patients and families to review available services, understand the distinction between inpatient and outpatient levels of care, and learn why co-occurring mental health conditions can influence treatment planning before making decisions about the next stage of care.

Additional information about Compassion Behavioral Health's Fort Lauderdale treatment services, including PHP, IOP, outpatient programming, dual-diagnosis treatment, behavioral therapies, psychiatric support, and related addiction treatment resources, is available on the organization's website.
