The Law Office of Lawrence M. Centanni has opened an online resource center covering mortgage terms, foreclosure procedure, refinancing and lender disputes for New Jersey homeowners and buyers.

The resource center organizes material by the situation a reader is in rather than by area of law, according to the firm. Representatives said someone facing a lender dispute and someone preparing to close on a purchase need different information, and that the material was arranged accordingly.

Mortgage terminology accounts for one section, according to representatives. They said loan documents use language that carries specific legal meaning, and that borrowers frequently sign without understanding which provisions govern what happens if payments are missed.

Refinancing is addressed separately, according to the firm. Representatives said the process differs from an initial purchase in what documents are involved and what obligations change, and that homeowners often assume a refinance simply replaces existing terms without reviewing what else is affected.

Lender and servicer disputes receive coverage as well, according to representatives. They said questions about payment application, escrow accounting and servicing transfers come up regularly, and that the material describes what records matter when a dispute develops.

Someone looking for a lawyer for mortgage in Elizabeth, NJ often does so after a problem has developed, according to the firm. Representatives said the material is written with earlier stages in mind as well, since some situations are easier to address before they advance.

Foreclosure procedure in New Jersey runs through the courts, according to representatives. They said this affects timelines and what options remain at each stage, and that the material describes the sequence so readers can identify where a case stands.

The firm participates in community events and legal seminars, according to the firm. Representatives said these give residents an opportunity to raise questions directly, and that the schedule is published alongside the resource center.

Working relationships with financial institutions and real estate professionals inform the material, according to representatives. They said these professionals encounter recurring questions from their own clients, and that the resource center addresses subjects raised from both directions.

The material describes general procedure and does not address individual matters, according to the firm. Representatives said outcomes depend on the specific facts of a case, and that the resource center states this rather than implying a general answer applies to any particular situation.

Closing documents receive their own section, according to the firm. Representatives said buyers encounter a substantial volume of paperwork at closing with limited time to review it, and that the material describes what the principal documents establish so readers arrive with some familiarity.

Escrow accounting is a recurring source of questions, according to representatives. They said homeowners often see payment amounts change without a clear explanation, and that the material describes how escrow adjustments work and what documentation a servicer is required to provide.

Servicing transfers are covered as well, according to the firm. Representatives said a loan changing hands is common and does not alter the underlying terms, but that payment instructions and points of contact change, which they said accounts for a portion of the disputes that develop.

Property records and liens are addressed in a separate entry, according to representatives. They said unresolved items in a property's record can surface during a transaction, and that the material describes how these are typically identified before a closing date approaches.

Anyone seeking a lawyer for mortgage in Elizabeth, NJ should discuss their own circumstances directly, according to representatives. They said published material cannot account for the facts of a particular matter and is not a substitute for legal advice.

The firm said it plans to expand the resource center as questions accumulate. Representatives said additional material will be added when there is enough recurring interest in a subject, and that no publication schedule has been set.

Residents interested in the resource center or the seminar schedule can find information through the firm's website.
