

Designers Marble Adds Design Consultation Service for Bathroom Projects

September 09, 2026

WOODINVILLE, WA - September 09, 2026 -

Designers Marble has added a personalized design consultation service for bathroom remodeling clients, giving homeowners a planning stage that precedes any commitment to a project scope.

Consultations cover layout options, material selection, and how a space will be used before an estimate is prepared, according to the company. Representatives said homeowners often arrive with a set of images rather than a plan, and that the consultation is where preferences are translated into what a specific space can accommodate.

Existing conditions constrain what is possible, according to representatives. They said plumbing locations, window placement, door swing and available square footage determine which layouts are practical, and that consultations establish those limits early rather than after a design has been developed.

Homeowners searching for a bathroom remodeler near me are frequently comparing several companies at once, according to the company. Representatives said a defined scope makes those comparisons meaningful, and that estimates prepared against different assumptions cannot be compared directly.

Fixture selection is addressed during consultation, according to representatives. They said larger showers, freestanding tubs and similar features carry space and plumbing requirements that are easier to evaluate before a layout is settled than after.

Water use and lighting efficiency come up during selection, according to the company. Representatives said fixtures vary considerably in water consumption and lighting in energy use, and that consultations describe what each option involves rather than presenting one as preferable.

Material choices are reviewed for maintenance as well as appearance, according to representatives. They said natural stone requires periodic sealing that engineered surfaces do not, and that homeowners are told what upkeep a selection involves before it is finalized.

Ventilation is evaluated during planning, according to the company. Representatives said exhaust capacity is often inadequate in existing bathrooms and is straightforward to address during a renovation, but difficult afterward.

Storage is addressed alongside fixtures, according to representatives. They said homeowners commonly settle finishes and fixtures first and consider storage last, which limits what a finished space accommodates.

The company said it has completed more than 1,000 bathroom remodels. Representatives said the consultation format was developed from patterns observed across that work, particularly around decisions homeowners revisit partway through a project.

Accessibility planning is raised during consultations, according to the company. Representatives said homeowners intending to remain in a home long term often want features such as curbless entries, blocking for future grab bars and wider clearances, and that these cost considerably less to include during a renovation than to retrofit.

Timeline expectations are established during the consultation as well, according to representatives. They said material lead times vary widely and can extend a project beyond what the construction work itself requires, and that selections are checked for availability before a schedule is set.

Households with a single bathroom plan differently, according to the company. Representatives said the length of time a space is unusable becomes the governing constraint, and that sequencing is discussed with those clients specifically.

Budget allocation is discussed openly during consultation, according to representatives. They said homeowners frequently distribute a budget without knowing which elements drive cost, and that plumbing relocation and material grade account for more variation than most other decisions.

Documentation follows each consultation, according to the company. Representatives said clients receive the layout options and selections discussed, which they said allows a homeowner to compare the approach against other companies before committing.

Anyone comparing companies after searching for a bathroom remodeler near me should confirm what an estimate includes, according to representatives. They said scope, materials, and allowances vary between estimates in ways that are not always apparent from a total figure.

The company said it plans to review the consultation format as clients use it. Representatives said adjustments will depend on which portions produce the most useful decisions, and that no timeline has been set.
