Bluegrass Bernedoodles Highlights Why Temperament Matters as Families Choose the Standard Bernedoodle

Bluegrass Bernedoodles is drawing attention to a growing shift among families searching for a larger dog, noting that many are now weighing temperament and trainability as heavily as physical size when selecting a companion. The organization points to the Standard Bernedoodle as a breed that reflects this change, combining a substantial frame with the intelligence and people-oriented disposition that families increasingly seek.

Standard Bernedoodles, a cross between a Bernese Mountain Dog and a Poodle, typically weigh between 45 and 115 pounds and stand 23 to 29 inches tall. Their adult size can vary widely depending on the parents, particularly because Bernese is in their lineage. Coats can be wavy, curly or straight, and the breed is recognized for loyalty, gentle temperament and adaptability as both family pets and service animals.

According to Bluegrass Bernedoodles, size alone should not drive a family's decision. Larger dogs that can reach 70 or 90 pounds must be manageable in everyday household settings. That reality places added importance on intelligence, early socialization, temperament and consistent training, all of which shape whether a large dog becomes a well-adjusted member of the home.

"When a dog is going to grow to 70 or 90 pounds, trainability stops being optional and becomes essential," says trainers for Bluegrass Bernedoodles. ?In addition to size consideration, families should also consider energy level, confidence, sociability and how an individual puppy's temperament fits their daily routine. A large dog that was raised with an advance puppy curriculum is far easier to live with than one that was never raised intentionally through those early stages.?

Bluegrass Bernedoodles, incorporates structured early development practices. Puppies are raised using early neurological stimulation beginning shortly after birth, along with a puppy curriculum, daily handling, noise exposure and temperament evaluations. These methods aim to strengthen stress tolerance and produce dogs that are confident and socially comfortable before they ever reach their new homes.

Standard Bernedoodles also come in several generations, including F1, F1b, Reverse F1b, Ultra and Multigen varieties, each resulting from different combinations of Bernese Mountain Dogs, Poodles and Bernedoodles. This range allows families to consider projected adult size and coat characteristics alongside temperament when choosing a puppy.

"The families who do best with a large breed are the ones who plan for the adult dog, not just the puppy," Lynch added. "That is why early socialization and temperament evaluation matter so much. It sets the foundation for the dog they will live with for the next decade."

Bluegrass Bernedoodles works to inform families about responsible breed selection and the developmental practices that shape a puppy's long-term behavior. The organization emphasizes the connection between early handling, structured socialization and the lifelong temperament of family dogs, with particular focus on larger breeds such as the Standard Bernedoodle.
