

Viking Disposal Reveals Whether a Dumpster Can Go on the Street Across North Shore Towns

September 22, 2026

MIDDLETON, MA - September 22, 2026 -

Placing a dumpster on a public street in Massachusetts generally requires a permit, and the specific rules, fees, and time limits vary significantly from one town to the next. That finding comes from Viking Disposal, a Greater Boston waste removal company that contacted the Department of Public Works in every North Shore town along its delivery route to document what homeowners and businesses actually face when they need a container placed curbside.

Rather than rely on the common assumption that "rules vary," Viking Disposal set out to record the specifics. The effort involved direct calls to municipal departments across Danvers, Peabody, Salem, Beverly, Marblehead, Middleton, Ipswich, Rowley, Newburyport, and Gloucester. The research found documented inconsistency in how each town handles a street placement permit, including differences in whether a fee applies, whether an insurance certificate is required, and how many days a container may remain on the road.

The findings matter for Massachusetts home and business owners planning renovations, cleanouts, or construction projects, where a dumpster is often the largest logistical hurdle. A container placed in a private driveway typically faces fewer requirements than one placed on a public street, where a dumpster permit may be tied to street width, traffic volume, and which municipal department oversees the roadway. Skipping the step can carry consequences, including fines that exceed the original permit cost.

Viking Disposal has published a guide on dumpster permit rules summarizing the research. Readers can review a town-by-town breakdown of permit rules and fees in the company's report, Dumpster Permit Rules by Town: What North Shore Homeowners Actually Pay.

"The rules differ town to town because the underlying conditions differ town to town," said Lorenzo Puopolo, Owner of Viking Disposal. "A narrow, busy street in one community carries different safety and traffic considerations than a quiet residential road in another, and the department that owns the road often sets the fee accordingly. Homeowners are frequently surprised that a neighboring town has an entirely different process, so documenting each one removes the guesswork."

The research also distinguishes between one-time cleanout projects and ongoing service arrangements, since the permit considerations can differ depending on how long a container stays in place. Viking Disposal noted that the timing of a permit application is often overlooked, and that contacting the relevant department before delivery helps avoid delays.

The company reported that certain town-specific figures remain in progress as departments confirm current fee schedules, and that the published breakdown will continue to be updated as information is verified.

Viking Disposal is a waste removal company based in Greater Boston. Founded in 2023 by owner Lorenzo Puopolo, Viking Dumpster and disposal services operate on core values of integrity, reliability, and a service-first approach. The company offers residential pickup, commercial pickup, and roll-off dumpster rentals, serving business owners, schools, contractors, municipal collections, and property managers. A portion of every rental supports the Alzheimer's Foundation, contributing to research and to families affected by the disease.
