Midwest Moving Company Expands Storage Capacity and Lease Terms

September 18, 2026

CHARLOTTE, NC - September 18, 2026 -
Midwest Moving Company has expanded its storage capacity in Fargo, adding units across a wider range of sizes and revising its lease structure to accommodate customers whose timelines do not fit a standard monthly commitment.

The lease terms are the substantive part of the change. Storage has historically been sold on rigid monthly cycles, which means a customer who needs a unit for six weeks pays for two full months, and a customer who vacates on the third of the month pays through the thirty-first. The expanded offering allows short-term arrangements that align with actual need, which matters most for the situations that drive storage demand in the first place: a closing date that slipped, a lease gap between apartments, a renovation running long, a business waiting on a buildout.

Unit sizes now range from spaces suited to the contents of a single room up to capacity for a full household or commercial inventory. Sizing is where customers most often guess wrong in both directions. A common error is renting on square footage alone without accounting for ceiling height, since a unit that is rated for a two-bedroom apartment assumes goods stacked to the ceiling rather than set out at floor level. The opposite error is renting oversized and paying for months of unused space. Anyone unsure should count in rooms rather than square feet and ask staff to walk a unit before signing, which takes ten minutes and avoids a mid-move transfer.

Security at the expanded facility includes surveillance coverage, individually coded access, and staff checks of the grounds. Climate-controlled units are available for goods that warrant them. In a market with a temperature range of roughly 120 degrees between January and July, that category includes wood furniture, upholstery, leather, electronics, paper records, photographs, artwork, and instruments. It does not include most of what people actually put in storage. Dishes, tools, plastic bins, patio furniture, and sporting equipment do fine in a standard unit, and customers evaluating storage services in Fargo, ND are better served splitting their inventory between tiers than paying the premium on everything.

Commercial demand has grown alongside residential. Contractors need somewhere for materials and equipment between jobs. Retailers cycle seasonal stock. Offices consolidating or relocating need a place for furniture and files during transition. Businesses comparing storage services in Fargo, ND should look closely at access hours and load-in arrangements, since commercial use involves far more frequent in-and-out traffic than a household storing goods between two moving dates, and restricted access hours that are fine for a family are a real operating constraint for a contractor starting work at six.

Several practical points apply regardless of provider. Photograph and inventory everything before it goes in, because a list reconstructed months later will be incomplete and will not hold up if a claim is ever needed. Confirm how a homeowners or renters policy treats property stored off premises, since coverage is often capped well below the primary dwelling limit and is sometimes excluded outright. Do not store anything perishable, flammable, or under pressure. Dry appliances fully before sealing them in. Disassemble what comes apart and keep the hardware bagged and labeled with its piece. Leave an aisle if items will be retrieved at different times.
