

Peace of Growth Issues Guidance on AI Invoice Automation

September 23, 2026

Nottingham, England - September 23, 2026 -

Peace of Growth is issuing a voluntary advisory for US service businesses evaluating AI invoice automation, setting out checks for document accuracy, exception handling and approval responsibilities. The guidance addresses the decisions between receiving a supplier invoice and allowing its contents to change an operational or financial record.

The advisory follows the agency's September 10 announcement of its implementation partnership with Quartate. That collaboration covers document and data workflows, with a focus on field service businesses. Peace of Growth assesses the business requirement and manages the client relationship, while Quartate undertakes technical assessment and implementation of the agreed work.

The new guidance draws a clear boundary between extracting information and accepting it as correct. Reading a supplier name, purchase order reference or amount is one stage of a workflow. Establishing whether those details match the business's records, and deciding what happens when they do not, requires separate checks.

For an operator handling service visits, purchasing records and supplier paperwork, the advisory recommends defining a single recurring document process before expanding automation. The scope should identify the document's source, the record used to validate it, the intended destination and the person responsible when information is missing. This makes the proposed task specific enough to evaluate.

Peace of Growth recommends that evaluation documents include difficult examples as well as straightforward invoices. An unreadable reference, a duplicate submission or a mismatch between an order and a bill can reveal how a proposed system handles uncertainty. A successful demonstration on clean documents does not establish how it will behave across the full workload.

The advisory also separates a system's ability to prepare a record from its authority to act on that record. Businesses should specify which updates can proceed automatically, which require review and which actions remain with an authorized employee. The approval boundary should be established before a live workflow begins.

"An invoice can be read correctly and still be wrong for the job," said Muhammad Sarim Khan, founder of Peace of Growth. "The useful test is whether the system can connect that document to the right records, explain a mismatch and stop when a decision needs a person. That is the conversation a business should have before discussing how fast the automation runs."

Quartate's published approach describes checking AI output against existing records and retaining human approval for irreversible actions. The advisory applies that distinction to project evaluation rather than assuming that every document can move through the same path. Actual controls and integrations remain subject to the requirements of each engagement.

For measurement, the guidance recommends recording the volume processed, time spent reviewing exceptions and corrections required after processing. Comparisons should cover equivalent document types and include the effort that remains with staff. Software charges, maintenance and review time should also be included when considering the operating cost of a proposed workflow.

The advisory is voluntary company guidance, with the recommendations contained in this announcement. It establishes no certification or mandatory industry standard, and it reports no results from a completed joint deployment. Its purpose is to give owners and operations teams a defined basis for evaluating a proposed project.

Businesses considering an assessment can identify the workflow concerned and the records that would be needed to check it, then agree appropriate arrangements before sharing documents.
