

Society Beauty Bar Highlights Color Correction Guidance for Arlington Hair Salon Guests

September 24, 2026

ARLINGTON, MA - September 24, 2026 -

Color correction has become one of the most frequent requests at Society Beauty Bar, a boutique salon serving Arlington Heights and the surrounding Middlesex County communities. As more residents attempt at-home box dye or arrive with results from previous salon visits that did not meet expectations, the salon is drawing attention to the consultation process and technical planning that professional color correction requires.

The salon reports that hair needing repair after a prior color service represents a common and often misunderstood situation. Uneven tone, banding, unexpected brassiness, and over-processed sections frequently follow home coloring attempts. Rather than treating these cases with a single quick fix, the color team approaches each one through an assessment of the hair's history, condition, and the underlying pigment left behind by earlier products.

Every new color guest at the Arlington hair salon begins with a complimentary consultation before any service takes place. During this conversation, a color specialist reviews the client's hair history, examines current condition, and explains what a realistic correction path looks like, including whether the desired result can be reached in one visit or requires several sessions. This step is intended to set clear expectations before a client commits to a plan.

"Color correction is rarely about a single appointment, and honesty at the consultation matters more than anything," said Laura Khesin of Society Beauty Bar. "When someone comes in after a box dye or a color that did not turn out the way they hoped, the responsible thing is to explain what the hair can handle safely and map out the steps to get there."

The salon's color team is trained across a range of techniques, including hand-painting, foil work, and single-process application. That breadth allows specialists to select the method suited to each correction rather than applying one approach to every case. Balayage and lived-in color, babylights, and gloss treatments are among the tools available once a corrective plan is established and the hair is deemed ready.

Demand for these services reflects a client base that reaches beyond Arlington itself. The salon draws guests from Lexington, Belmont, Cambridge, and several other Greater Boston towns. Khesin noted that many arrive specifically because they want a professional to address results they attempted to achieve on their own.

"People underestimate how much lifted or layered color can affect the hair," Khesin said. "Our goal during a correction is to protect the integrity of the hair while moving toward the tone the client actually wanted in the first place."

The salon encourages anyone considering correction to seek a consultation before applying additional color at home, since repeated attempts can complicate the process and limit safe options.

Society Beauty Bar is a boutique salon founded by Laura Khesin and located in Arlington Heights, Massachusetts, at the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and Park Avenue, with a second location in Belmont Center. The salon specializes in custom color and precision cuts, offering balayage and lived-in color, foils, single-process and all-over color, haircuts and styling, smoothing treatments, hair extensions, and bridal hair services. It operates Tuesday through Saturday.
