

Meso Lawyer PA Expands Mesothelioma Law Firm Resources

October 05, 2026

PHILADELPHIA, PA - October 05, 2026 -
Meso Lawyer PA has expanded its Pennsylvania mesothelioma law firm informational resources in September 2026 to include additional material relevant to McKeesport and the Monongahela Valley. The update provides historical and procedural information concerning asbestos exposure investigations, civil litigation, and records that can become relevant in Pennsylvania mesothelioma matters.

The updated material places McKeesport within the broader industrial history of western Pennsylvania. Steel production, manufacturing, construction, transportation, maintenance work, and related industrial activity form part of the historical record examined in asbestos litigation involving the Monongahela Valley.

?Meso Lawyer PA continues to review Pennsylvania asbestos information so the published material reflects the records, locations, and legal procedures associated with these cases,? said Michael Schafle, Esq., founding partner of Green & Schafle, LLC. ?The McKeesport material is part of that continuing documentation effort.?

Meso Lawyer PA publishes attorney-reviewed material addressing Pennsylvania asbestos litigation, occupational exposure history, bankruptcy trust procedures, and filing considerations. The site identifies Schafle as the attorney responsible for reviewing its legal information and identifies Green & Schafle, LLC as the law firm associated with the practice.

Mesothelioma cases can require examination of events that occurred decades before a diagnosis. An exposure investigation may involve employment files, Social Security records, union records, medical documentation, product information, deposition testimony, and historical records concerning industrial facilities. The specific records involved depend on the work history, exposure circumstances, companies, and products associated with an individual matter.

McKeesport developed as part of the industrial corridor along the Monongahela River, where steelmaking and related industries employed workers in numerous trades. Historical asbestos investigations in western Pennsylvania can involve work performed by pipefitters, boilermakers, insulators, laborers, maintenance personnel, construction workers, and other employees whose duties placed them around industrial equipment or building materials.

The updated legal resources describe how attorneys may reconstruct an occupational history when records are several decades old. That process can include identifying former employers, job sites, contractors, manufacturers, suppliers, and products associated with a particular period of employment. Available documentation varies according to the workplace, occupation, employer, and years involved.

Pennsylvania asbestos matters can involve civil litigation, bankruptcy trust claims, or both processes. Bankruptcy trusts were established by certain companies that entered bankruptcy after manufacturing or distributing asbestos-containing products, while civil lawsuits proceed against parties that remain subject to litigation. Each system has separate documentation standards, filing procedures, and eligibility requirements.

State law also establishes limitation periods for personal injury and wrongful death actions. The filing period applicable to a particular mesothelioma matter depends on the facts, relevant dates, type of claim, and governing law. Meso Lawyer PA presents its published material as general legal information rather than as a determination of any individual filing deadline or legal right.

Schafle was admitted to practice in Pennsylvania in 2005 and is also admitted in New Jersey. He co-founded Green & Schafle, LLC, and his practice includes asbestos litigation, toxic tort matters, complex personal injury litigation, and other civil claims. Public information about the practice identifies its office at 2332 South Broad Street in Philadelphia.

Meso Lawyer PA launched its statewide informational resource during 2026 and has continued adding and reviewing material concerning Pennsylvania communities, occupations, industrial sites, asbestos bankruptcy trusts, and court procedures. Published materials identify the reviewing attorney and distinguish general informational content from legal advice applicable to a specific matter.

The McKeesport-related material forms part of that statewide documentation project rather than a separate local office announcement. Meso Lawyer PA continues to organize Pennsylvania exposure information by community, occupation, workplace history, and legal process so historical records can be considered within the broader context of asbestos litigation.

The practice also publishes information describing how a mesothelioma matter can proceed after an initial legal review. An investigation may include collecting employment and medical records, identifying possible exposure sources, reviewing potential bankruptcy trust eligibility, examining responsible entities, and preparing filings when litigation is appropriate. The sequence differs according to the evidence and procedural requirements associated with each matter.

Meso Lawyer PA states that its online materials are informational and do not constitute legal or medical advice, create an attorney-client relationship, or predict the result of any individual matter.
