

Meso Lawyer PA Adds Asbestos Exposure Attorney Resource

October 07, 2026

PHILADELPHIA, PA - October 07, 2026 -
Meso Lawyer PA has expanded its asbestos exposure attorney resources in September 2026 with information addressing how Pennsylvania exposure histories are investigated, including occupational records associated with communities such as Munhall. The update explains the records, workplaces, products, and legal procedures that can become relevant when attorneys examine alleged asbestos exposure occurring decades before an asbestos-related diagnosis.

The new material addresses the distinction between identifying a medical diagnosis and reconstructing the circumstances of historical exposure. Asbestos litigation can require review of employment histories, job duties, former industrial facilities, contractors, equipment, manufacturers, suppliers, and other records connected with a person?s work or household history.

?An asbestos exposure investigation starts with the historical facts surrounding where a person worked, what duties were performed, and what records remain available from that period,? said Michael Schafle, Esq., founding partner of Green & Schafle, LLC. ?The updated material explains how those records fit into the investigative process used in Pennsylvania asbestos matters.?

The asbestos exposure material explains that occupational exposure can involve circumstances dating back several decades. Documents considered during an investigation may include Social Security employment histories, union records, personnel documents, medical records, worksite information, deposition testimony, product records, and historical information concerning former employers or industrial facilities.

Work histories can involve multiple employers and job sites. An investigation may examine the dates an individual worked at a location, the tasks performed there, equipment present in the work area, materials used during the relevant period, and companies responsible for manufacturing or supplying identified products. Available evidence varies according to the occupation, location, employer, and time period involved.

Munhall is included as historical context because of its connection with the industrial development of the Monongahela Valley and the steel industry in western Pennsylvania. Industrial employment in the region included steel production, construction, maintenance, transportation, mechanical work, and related trades. The inclusion of a community or industrial facility in historical materials does not establish that a particular worker encountered asbestos or that a particular company bears legal responsibility.

Exposure can also be investigated outside a worker?s direct employment. Meso Lawyer PA?s published materials address secondary exposure, sometimes called household or take-home exposure, in which asbestos fibers allegedly traveled from an occupational setting on clothing or other materials. Whether such circumstances support a legal claim depends on the evidence and law applicable to the individual matter.

The role of an asbestos exposure attorney can include organizing these historical records and evaluating them within the requirements of civil litigation or asbestos bankruptcy trust procedures. Separate companies may have different legal statuses because some former asbestos defendants entered bankruptcy and established trusts, while other entities remain subject to claims through the civil court system.

Pennsylvania also has procedural requirements governing asbestos litigation. Meso Lawyer PA publishes information concerning Pennsylvania asbestos law and the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas asbestos program, which has operated under the master caption In re: Asbestos Litigation, No. 1986-00001 since 1986. Schafle is identified by the practice as counsel in that asbestos docket.

The legal process can differ according to whether a matter involves personal injury, wrongful death, a survival action, a bankruptcy trust claim, or a combination of proceedings. Each category can have separate filing requirements, evidentiary standards, responsible parties, and procedural steps. Published information therefore describes general processes rather than determining which claim applies to a particular set of circumstances.

Schafle is a founding partner of Green & Schafle, LLC and has been admitted to practice in Pennsylvania since 2005. His published professional biography identifies his work as including asbestos and mass-tort litigation and states that he serves as counsel in Philadelphia?s asbestos litigation docket. Additional background about Schafle is available through the attorney information published by Meso Lawyer PA.

Meso Lawyer PA continues to publish Pennsylvania-focused material concerning occupational exposure histories, secondary exposure, asbestos litigation procedures, bankruptcy trusts, and related court processes. The information is presented for general educational purposes and does not determine whether an individual has a legal claim or establish the outcome of any proceeding.
