Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law, a Nashville-based firm, has underscored its membership in the American Immigration Lawyers Association (AILA) as part of its ongoing commitment to upholding professional standards in immigration and administrative procedures. The affiliation positions the firm to provide informed representation for families pursuing green cards and other immigration benefits throughout the United States.

The firm, which has practiced for more than two decades, confirmed that its attorneys hold nationwide admission to practice immigration law. This jurisdictional capacity allows the firm to serve clients located in any U.S. state or territory, as well as individuals situated internationally. The announcement reflects a growing demand for guidance through complex processes such as marriage-based green cards, adjustment of status, and consular processing.

As a family-owned immigration law firm, Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law focuses on family-based green card applications, citizenship and naturalization matters, provisional waivers, and responses to Notices of Intent to Deny issued by U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. The firm also handles spouse and fiance visas, green card renewals, and waivers of inadmissibility.

"Membership in AILA reflects a daily commitment to staying current with evolving immigration regulations and procedures," said a spokesperson for Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law. "That knowledge translates directly into clearer, more reliable guidance for families working to reunite in the United States."

Family-based green cards fall into two primary categories. Immediate relative visas serve close family members of U.S. citizens, including spouses, unmarried children under 21, and parents, and carry no annual caps. Family preference visas cover more distant relationships, such as married children, adult children, and siblings of U.S. citizens, along with certain relatives of lawful permanent residents. These preference categories are subject to annual limits that require careful planning and timely filing.

The firm noted that eligibility for a green card generally depends on proof of a qualifying relationship, an affidavit of financial support, a medical examination, and police clearance, along with attention to priority dates and the monthly visa bulletin. Applicants already in the United States may pursue adjustment of status, while those abroad typically complete consular processing at a U.S. consulate in their home country.

"The process involves strict deadlines and detailed documentation, and small errors can cause significant delays," the spokesperson added. "The focus remains on accurate filings submitted on time, with attention to each client's individual circumstances."

Clients and prospective applicants may visit the firm's office in Nashville to discuss their cases. In addition to green card matters, the Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law Office assists with U visas, work authorization, travel authorization and advanced parole, petitions to remove conditions on residency, and appeals of denials from USCIS field offices.

Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law is a family-owned and operated law firm based in Nashville, Tennessee, with a practice concentrated in immigration law. With more than twenty years of experience, the firm serves clients across the United States and internationally, offering representation in green card applications, citizenship, visas, waivers, and related administrative proceedings.
