

Single and the City Introduces LGBTQ Speed Dating Events in NYC for Intentional Connections

Single and the City, a women-owned events company specializing in singles gatherings, has introduced dedicated LGBTQ speed dating events in New York City in response to growing demand among singles seeking more intentional ways to connect. The expanded programming arrives as many daters express fatigue with app-based matching and look toward in-person formats that prioritize genuine conversation.

The new events give LGBTQ+ participants a structured setting to meet multiple potential partners through a series of short, face-to-face conversations. The format is designed to help attendees gauge compatibility quickly while remaining in a comfortable and welcoming environment. The addition reflects a broader shift among singles who increasingly favor curated gatherings over passive online browsing.

Single and the City in New York City has long organized singles parties, themed mixers, and speed dating sessions across the city. Single and the City LGBTQ+ speed dating events join a roster of offerings that includes Fleet Week mixers, Halloween parties, New Year's Eve celebrations, silent discos, and yacht gatherings. Each event is built around the idea that meaningful connections are more likely to form through shared experiences and direct interaction.

"The introduction of LGBTQ speed dating reflects what daters have been asking for," said a spokesperson for Single and the City. "People want settings where they can be themselves and have real conversations rather than endless scrolling. These events provide that space, with a focus on inclusion and authentic connection."

The company noted that the trend toward intentional dating has been building for some time. Many singles report that app interactions can feel impersonal and time-consuming, leaving them searching for alternatives that allow personalities to come through more clearly. Speed dating addresses that concern by condensing many introductions into a single evening, giving participants a sense of chemistry that text messages often fail to convey.

"Speed dating works because it removes the guesswork," the spokesperson added. "In a few minutes of conversation, participants learn far more than they would from a profile. Bringing that format to the LGBTQ+ community in an inclusive environment was a natural next step."

The LGBTQ speed dating events are part of the company's wider mission to create fun and relaxed environments where singles can meet. Alongside its events, Single and the City offers dating consulting for individuals seeking guidance on conversation skills and dating strategies, as well as a blog featuring dating tips drawn from years of hosting experience.

Single and the City organizes singles parties, speed dating, and themed events for singles in New York City and Austin, Texas. The company identifies as women-owned and LGBTQ+ friendly, and it designs its gatherings to foster comfortable, engaging settings where attendees can meet like-minded individuals. Its programming spans casual mixers, seasonal celebrations, and specialized events intended to bring singles together through shared interests and direct interaction.
