

Bullying RV Center Issues Guidance On RV Manufacturer Warranties

October 13, 2026

DULUTH, MN - October 13, 2026 -

Bullying RV Center is issuing guidance on the structure and limits of RV warranties for RVs. The dealership has published an explanation of how coverage typically works for towable units and motorhomes, and how authorized service centers handle warranty claims.

Manufacturer warranties on recreational vehicles generally run from one to three years, with some structural coverage extending up to five years from the purchase date. Coverage is intended for defects in materials or workmanship rather than ordinary wear. Towable units such as travel trailers and fifth wheels do not have a motorized chassis. Motorhomes combine a chassis, commonly built by Freightliner, Ford, RAM, or Mercedes-Benz, with a coach section constructed on top. Because of that dual construction, motorized units often carry separate warranties for the powertrain and for the coach.

The coach portion typically addresses items such as slide-out mechanisms, roof systems, and appliances. The powertrain portion covers the engine, transmission, and related drivetrain components. Company materials note that warranty coverage is not the same as insurance and does not automatically include every repair that arises during the warranty period. Owners are advised to review what repairs are included, the duration of coverage, actions that can void a warranty, which facilities are authorized to perform work, and how claims are submitted.

Typical coverage includes issues traceable to manufacturing, such as faulty wiring, appliance problems, or slide-out malfunctions. Damage from accidents, severe weather, or poor maintenance is generally excluded, as is normal wear. Some warranties are written with weekend or seasonal use in mind rather than full-time living, and certain manufacturers do not transfer remaining coverage to a subsequent owner. Those limits can affect both new purchases and the evaluation of pre-owned units.

"Warranty terms differ by manufacturer and by the type of unit," said Charlie Bedor, Marketing Manager. "Understanding the distinction between coach coverage and powertrain coverage, and knowing whether a warranty transfers, helps a buyer evaluate what is actually included before a purchase is completed."

Bullyan RV Center operates as an authorized warranty center for several manufacturers whose products appear in its inventory, including Winnebago, Grand Design, Keystone, Forest River, and Coachmen. A Certified RV Warranty Administrator is on staff to handle warranty and recall administration. Service work described on the company site includes appliance and systems repair, roof and seal work, plumbing and electrical service, and seasonal maintenance. Warranty-related repairs must be performed at an authorized facility to preserve coverage.

Bedor added, "When a claim is filed, the documentation and the location where the work is performed both matter. Having an authorized center and a warranty administrator on site allows the process to stay within the manufacturer's requirements."

The guidance also notes that structural warranties may run longer than the standard coverage period on some models. Motorized warranties are often expressed in both years and miles. Buyers comparing units from different manufacturers can review the specific terms for each brand rather than assuming all warranties follow the same schedule. The dealership stocks new and used recreational vehicles from the manufacturers for which it holds warranty authorization, so comparison of coverage can occur alongside comparison of floor plans and specifications.

Company materials further state that questions about what would void a warranty, who is authorized to perform repairs, and how a claim is initiated are among the details worth confirming before a unit leaves the lot. Full-time use restrictions, if present, are typically stated in the warranty document rather than in general sales literature. Non-transferable provisions are relevant both to someone who may later sell the unit and to someone considering a pre-owned purchase.

Bullyan RV Center is a family-owned recreational vehicle dealership that has operated in the Duluth area since 1954. The business sells new and used recreational vehicles and maintains an on-site service department that performs warranty work for authorized brands. Its inventory includes travel trailers, fifth wheels, and motorhomes from the manufacturers listed above, along with related parts and service support. The warranty guidance is drawn from the dealership's published explanation of manufacturer coverage and from its description of authorized service capabilities.

The release restates information already available on the company site rather than announcing a change in warranty policy or a new service offering. It places that information on the record so that buyers reviewing new or pre-owned units have a clearer view of what manufacturer warranties typically cover and what they typically exclude.
