

Bidbus Puts Local Dealer Bidding Into an Online Car-Selling Process

October 23, 2026

Irvine, CA - October 23, 2026 -
Bidbus gives car owners in California and Texas a way to list a vehicle and receive competing bids from local dealerships online. The Bidbus sell my car online process begins with vehicle details and a private minimum selling price, then moves into a live dealer auction. Bidbus runs the marketplace rather than buying the vehicle itself; the winning dealer is the purchaser.

For a seller, the first step is to provide a vehicle identification number, photos, and information about condition. The platform uses those details to prepare a listing and suggests a minimum selling price for the owner to review. That minimum is not shown as a number to dealers, and the seller confirms it before the auction begins.

The minimum deserves careful attention because it defines the seller's commitment. Bidbus says a vehicle does not sell if bidding finishes below that figure, and the seller owes no auction fee in that case. If a winning bid meets or exceeds the confirmed minimum, the company's explanation says the sale goes through to the highest bidder. Owners should therefore choose a floor they are genuinely prepared to accept.

Once listed, the vehicle enters a live auction in which verified local dealers can bid against one another. Sellers can follow bids as they arrive rather than contacting multiple dealerships individually. Dealer participation and the final offer depend on the specific vehicle and market, so the auction provides a price-discovery process, not a promise that every car will attract the same level of interest.

Bidbus says it currently operates in California and Texas and accepts most drivable passenger vehicles with clean titles, including sedans, SUVs, trucks, hybrids, and electric vehicles. Its published criteria exclude salvage or branded titles, unrepaired damage, motorcycles, and heavy commercial vehicles. Owners should confirm that their particular car and location qualify before treating an estimate as a listing invitation.

After a successful auction, the winning dealer buys and pays for the vehicle. Most dealers ask for a drop-off at their lot, although pickup can be available depending on the dealer.

The company says listing and running an auction are free, and no fee is charged when bids stay below the minimum selling price. When a sale closes, Bidbus lists a success fee of one percent of the sale price, subject to a $300 minimum, deducted from proceeds. Sellers comparing offers should focus on the amount they would receive after that fee and any loan balance, not only the highest bid displayed.

Paperwork is another part of the transaction. According to Bidbus, the winning dealer handles title and registration paperwork, while the platform assists with the process and, in California, files a release of liability on the seller's behalf. Requirements can differ by state and by whether the vehicle has a lien, so owners should check the documents and payment arrangements for their own sale.

The model is intended for owners who want to see dealer demand without negotiating one shop at a time. Some may already have an instant-offer quote and use it as a reference when deciding what minimum price to confirm; others may want to understand what local dealers will bid for a particular VIN. Either way, the confirmed floor and the net proceeds matter more than a general claim about speed or price.

The Bidbus sell my car online experience is available to eligible sellers in the company's current service areas. Vehicle owners can review the listing requirements, auction rules, fee, and handoff process before entering an auction. The result depends on the car, the dealers who participate, and the minimum price the seller has chosen, not on a guaranteed sale price or completion time.
