Skin Elevé Expands Full-Face Rejuvenation Availability

October 20, 2026

CHATSWORTH, CA - October 20, 2026 -
Skin Elevé, a medical aesthetics spa based in Chatsworth, California, is expanding access to its full-face rejuvenation service for adults throughout the western San Fernando Valley. The expansion covers Simi Valley, Northridge, Porter Ranch, West Hills, Reseda, and Canoga Park, following a steady rise in inquiries from those communities.

Skin Elevé provides full-face rejuvenation to clients throughout the western San Fernando Valley, evaluating facial proportion, volume, and contour as a whole rather than treating a single feature in isolation. The approach begins with an assessment of facial structure and the client's stated goals, from which providers build an individualized plan addressing volume loss, softened contours, and visible lines that tend to develop across several areas of the face at once. Full-face rejuvenation allows providers to assess how a change in one area affects the appearance of another, rather than treating each concern independently.

The spa's injectable menu includes dermal fillers for the cheeks, chin, jawline, and smile lines, along with multi-syringe options built for broader facial balancing. Sculptra, a biostimulatory injectable delivered across a series of sessions, offers a slower, collagen-building alternative for clients whose plan calls for progressive change rather than immediate volume. Providers also draw on PRF treatments, microneedling, laser facials, and lip fillers, giving them several tools to match a recommendation to the concern rather than applying one procedure to every client.

Facial aging rarely follows the same pattern from person to person. Genetics, skin quality, anatomy, past procedures, and lifestyle all shape what a provider observes during an assessment, which is why Skin Elevé's consultations focus on evaluating the individual rather than defaulting to a standard injection pattern. Dermal fillers, for instance, restore volume by adding material to carefully chosen areas, but placement and quantity depend on the person rather than a fixed formula.

"Full face rejuvenation allows providers to look at the face as a whole rather than focusing on one feature in isolation," said Mary Bilbulyan, owner of Skin Elevé. "The goal is a plan built around the individual's structure, concerns, and preferences, with education and careful planning guiding every step."

A client focused on changes around the lower face, for example, may find that volume loss elsewhere is contributing to what they are noticing, a connection that a whole-face assessment is designed to catch. Skin Elevé's providers weigh the relationship between features before recommending treatment, aiming for outcomes that restore proportion without altering a client's recognizable characteristics.

Aging changes also do not arrive on a fixed timeline. Cheeks and temples can lose volume years before contours begin to soften elsewhere, and lines that seem to appear suddenly are often the visible endpoint of gradual changes beneath the surface. Skin Elevé's assessment process is built to catch those earlier signals rather than waiting until a concern becomes pronounced, giving providers more options for a gradual, natural-looking plan.

Clients seeking full-face rejuvenation arrive with a range of starting points. Some are noticing early volume loss around the cheeks and want a plan to stay ahead of more visible signs of aging. Others have tried isolated treatments for a single line or feature and found that the change did not read as natural against the rest of the face. Skin Elevé's providers treat both groups the same way, starting with an assessment rather than a predetermined product or technique.

That assessment also considers skin quality alongside underlying structure, since collagen support and surface-level treatments can work together with injectable volume rather than in place of it. A client whose plan centers on dermal filler for the cheeks and jawline may still benefit from a microneedling or laser-based step addressing skin texture, and Skin Elevé's providers factor that combination into the broader recommendation rather than treating each service as a separate decision.

The expansion gives residents of Simi Valley, Northridge, Porter Ranch, West Hills, Reseda, and Canoga Park a nearby, consultation-first option for facial rejuvenation, distinct from single-area treatments such as lip or cheek filler alone that do not evaluate the face as a whole.
