Cestari Introduces Pantry Organization Ideas Pairing Glass Canisters With Reusable Labels

November 06, 2026

LITTLETON, MA - November 06, 2026 -
Cestari has introduced a pantry organization approach for the January reset that pairs its tall borosilicate glass canisters with reusable chalkboard labels, giving households a method for bringing order to dry food storage at the start of the new year.

The method begins with transferring dry staples into the canisters, which are built for items such as pasta, grains, coffee and snacks. Each canister features a bamboo lid fitted with a silicone seal that keeps contents airtight. The company notes that the containers are intended for dry storage rather than meal preparation, distinguishing them from the stackable containers often used for refrigerated or portioned foods.

For dry staples, the company points to glass over plastic. The glass pasta storage jars keep contents visible, which allows households to track quantities and identify items at a glance. For care, the jar and silicone seal can go in the dishwasher, while the bamboo lid is intended to be hand-washed to preserve its finish.

The borosilicate glass construction is made to withstand everyday use, and the airtight seal limits exposure of contents such as coffee and pasta to air and moisture. At 11.5 inches tall, the canisters hold longer items like spaghetti upright while remaining suited to shorter staples such as rotini, grains and snacks.

To label the canisters, the company pairs them with its chalkboard pantry labels and chalk pens. The labels can be written on, erased with a damp cloth, repositioned and reused, which allows households to adjust their organization as contents change. The labels also fit settings beyond the kitchen, including offices, closets and other storage spaces.

"January is the time of year when many people step back and look at their kitchens with fresh eyes," said Susan MacDowell, spokesperson for Cestari. "The method here is simple. Move dry goods into sealed glass, write what is inside on a label, and the contents stay visible and easier to track through the year."

The combination of sealed glass canisters and adaptable labeling forms the basis of the approach, which centers on visibility, dry-goods freshness and the ability to adjust storage over time. The steps apply across a range of dry staples rather than a single item.

"A reset works through the year when the system can change with the household," MacDowell added. "Because the labels are reusable, a jar that held pasta one month can hold grains the next without starting over. That is how the method stays in place long after January."
