Restoration Health Chiropractic Details Perinatal Care

November 18, 2026

LITTLE ROCK, AR - November 18, 2026 -
Restoration Health Chiropractic is outlining its perinatal chiropractic care, describing how the practice approaches chiropractic services for people planning a pregnancy and those who are expecting. The service is part of the practice?s published care offering in Little Rock and is presented as a distinct area within its broader chiropractic and wellness work.

The practice?s service information identifies preconception and perinatal care separately from its general corrective chiropractic, pediatric, and wellness services. Its description focuses on the spine and pelvis, stress, and overall well-being in the context of pregnancy and childbirth. By setting out the service as a specific category, the practice provides a clearer account of the populations and concerns addressed within this part of its care model.

The service page describes the intended audience as people planning for a baby as well as those who are already expecting. That distinction places the service across more than one point in the family-planning process. The practice?s published information does not frame the service as a universal protocol; it describes an area of care in which individual circumstances and needs are relevant to the discussion.

?Preconception and perinatal care involve personal circumstances that can differ from one individual to another,? said Dr. Michael Butler, Owner and Chief Vision Officer of Restoration Health Chiropractic. ?The first step is understanding the person?s goals and concerns, then discussing what the practice?s chiropractic services include and whether an evaluation is appropriate.?

The practice identifies spinal and pelvic alignment as central subjects within its preconception and perinatal service description. It also lists stress and overall well-being among the areas considered in this category. The information gives readers a general view of the service?s stated focus without suggesting that chiropractic care replaces prenatal medical care or the guidance of an obstetric professional. Decisions about pregnancy-related health needs remain matters for qualified medical providers, and the practice?s description is not a substitute for that care.

Restoration Health?s website also places this service alongside care for children and families. Its broader service information notes that the practice sees pregnant and prenatal patients as well as children, while separate pages describe pediatric care and general wellness services. This organization of the service menu reflects the practice?s family-oriented scope and distinguishes care categories according to the stage of life or type of concern being discussed.

The professional backgrounds listed on the team page provide additional context for the practice?s family-care focus. Dr. Michael Butler is identified as owner and chief vision officer and has advanced training in Chiropractic Biophysics, pediatrics, maternal care, and full-spine techniques. Molly Butler, owner and chief culture officer, holds a degree in health promotion and a minor in business from Auburn University. Those biographies establish the training and educational backgrounds the practice chooses to make available to the public.

?Clear information about the scope of a service helps families understand what a practice does and where a conversation about care may begin,? said Molly Butler, Owner and Chief Culture Officer of Restoration Health Chiropractic. ?The practice?s family services are described in separate categories so that people can review the focus of each area and consider their own questions with the appropriate health professionals.?

The practice?s published material includes a separate article about chiropractic care during pregnancy. That article discusses pregnancy-related changes and describes the practice?s interest in the relationship between spinal and pelvic considerations and the physical demands associated with pregnancy. The more current service listing presents the category in broader terms, emphasizing preconception and perinatal care rather than making a claim about a specific result or a standard course of treatment.

The distinction between service information and individual clinical decisions is important in pregnancy-related care. A general description can explain the subjects a practice addresses, but it cannot determine whether a particular service is suitable for a specific person. Pregnancy care often involves coordination with licensed medical professionals, and any questions about symptoms, complications, medication, or prenatal management should be directed to the person?s qualified medical team. The practice?s website positions its service as chiropractic care within a wider wellness setting, not as a replacement for obstetric care.

Restoration Health Chiropractic describes its broader mission as serving the community through neurologically based corrective chiropractic care and helping individuals make informed decisions about health within their families. Its services include corrective chiropractic care, preconception and perinatal care, pediatric care, wellness care, SoftWave Therapy, auto-accident care, and spinal traction. The practice?s team includes Dr. Michael Butler and Dr. Keith Beachy, alongside other clinical and support staff, and serves the Little Rock area through a family-focused chiropractic and wellness practice.
