

The Unplag Team Is Excited to Announce the Blog on Plagiarism Launch

May 25, 2015

May 25, 2015 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Unplag recently announced the opening of their blog on plagiarism, which is primarily designed to be an informative resource for educators and students. The purpose of the blog is to assist those who teach, study or write on a regular basis while avoiding getting caught in the plagiarism trap.

According to the company representative Vyacheslav Orishechko, a Head of Marketing Department, the blog will address plagiarism issues in three main categories: Helpies for Educators, Helpies for Students, and a Get Inspired category. Under each of these categories, visitors to the site may find more insight into not just detecting plagiarism and expert advice on how to avoid it, but also a bunch of curious plagiarism cases, life hacks to boost creative skills, tips on increasing productivity and more. All of the blog posts are inspired by students and professors' surveys conducted by Unplag as well as by their comments posted on the sites related to studying or teaching. To create buzzworthy articles, the team of blog writers includes authors with extensive experience in the field of education and writing, and will be soon enlarged with experts in blogging, law, and publishing.

Vyacheslav Orishechko also explained that with this blog, students could have access to practical information on a variety of subjects relating to plagiarism. Teachers will get advice on how to check for plagiarism in their student assignments. And the blog will help them understand and detect the student's motives using the information. He pointed out that at times, it's not just a matter of copying the text in question; it is also about not understanding how to cite their resources properly when writing their papers. When a teacher is equipped with the knowledge of how to check paper for plagiarism, it will be much easier for them to know how to direct their lessons and guidance to better benefit their students.

Students can also get advice on how to ensure the papers they turn in are 99 percent plagiarism free and avoid any embarrassing situations that may result from rejected content. The blog will give them practical guidance on how to correctly quote their online sources and write effectively by using paraphrasing in their papers.

The Get Inspired section of the blog mainly focuses on looking more closely at familiar figures that have used plagiarism in their works. It takes an ethical view of plagiarism and helps readers to see how the practice can easily be identified. Additionally, it outlines advice on developing public speaking techniques, the most renowned online libraries, ways on how to deal with critics, etc.

The site's blog will give everyone a valuable resource for understanding the growing problems related to plagiarism, not just in the classroom but in the corporate world as well. With so much information being shared online, it is easy to become a plagiarist without even realizing it. However, those who are studying, whether at the secondary school level or the university level, and those who are concerned with making sure their corporate papers are above board will be able to put this resource to great use.
