JASPER, GEORGIA ? Ray L. Perry, Chief Marketing Officer for MarketBlazer, Inc., teaches small business owners and entrepreneurs what thought leadership is ? and how to use this powerful tool in their marketing ? in his newest book. Do Leadership: A Step by Step Guide to ?Doing? Thought Leadership for Solopreneurs and Small Business Owners makes the benefits of thought leadership accessible to any size business.

The book defines thought leadership as: ?How brands can position themselves as leaders in their fields, industries, and sectors ? not just by what they say, but by actually demonstrating their expertise, values, unique points of view, and the ability to answer their target audiences? biggest questions.? A company?s thought leadership efforts should help to build the sort of connection with prospects and customers that causes them to know, like, and trust the company enough to want to do business with them.

The authors interviewed leaders from several small but significantly successful companies that have learned how to leverage their expertise to reach deep into their markets. Readers will get sound bits of advice and also read real life success stories meant to encourage and inform their efforts in becoming thought leaders.

As Perry shares in the book, "Quite simply, becoming a thought leader happens as you attract people who recognize you as someone worth listening to and following. Making this happen is not as difficult as it sounds, and as you read this book, you'll see what an important role content creation plays in building your credibility."

Becoming a thought leader is not a matter of throwing a hefty marketing budget behind a campaign. It's more about crafting a trustworthy presence by sharing valuable information with people who want and need answers. In the process of building a thought leadership presence, even a small company can simultaneously build a library of content marketing assets that can be repurposed and republished to amplify other marketing efforts cost-effectively.

Other benefits that thought leaders enjoy include increased website traffic, greater exposure among prospective customers, faster sales cycles, better definition and attraction of ideal customers, greater loyalty from existing customers, and the sort of market differentiation that enables them to avoid competing on price alone.

As Master and Certified Duct Tape Marketers, Perry and his co-authors tie the phases of the Marketing Hourglass to practical steps readers can take in their pursuit of thought leadership. The steps involve tasks most businesses are already taking in their marketing but go a bit further to stimulate inbound marketing results.
