When people who have cancer go through chemotherapy, they tend to lose all of their hair, including their eyelashes. This can lead to people feeling very insecure about their physical appearance, something that affects women in particular. Foxy Faces Spa, a spa in Glendale, AZ, is proud to announce that they have launched the Lash Project, which means that they now offer free lash extensions to women going through cancer treatment. More details about the spa and the project are available at <http://www.foxyfacedspa.com/>.

Sarah Ridley from Foxy Faces Spa says: "Cancer treatment is a difficult and emotional time, and we aim to help those going through the process to retain their feelings of femininity and normalcy in their daily lives. We encourage everyone to contact us to see how they can become involved in this project."

Foxy Faces Spa provides a number of other spa services as well. These include facials, chemical peels, massage, eyelash extensions, makeup, and waxing. Their goal is to ensure anyone can look their very best, as they believe that those who feel confident about what they look like on the outside, are more likely to feel good about who they are on the inside as well. Full details about their various spa services are available on their website.

Those who have used the services of the spa have been full of praise. "My daughter and I went in for facials and had an excellent service," says one customer on the company's Facebook page. "The staff is knowledgeable and was helpful talking to my 10 year old about how to take care of her skin. We left very relaxed with beautiful faces."

For Foxy Faces Spa, the goal is to make sure that every client is treated like an individual, finding the treatment methods that are most appropriate for their particular needs. This is one of the reasons why they have also decided to give back through their Lash Project, as they feel no woman should feel as if she is no longer beautiful, regardless of her unique situation. The project is proving to be very popular.
