Many people would like to add some cream to their coffee but not everybody likes milk as it is quite high in calories while some simply cannot drink milk due to lactose intolerance or simply want something with a unique taste. GraceKennedy, the Caribbean's leading food manufacturer and distributor, is very happy to announce that their dried coconut milk is now regularly being used as a coconut coffee creamer.

Deidre, a company representative shared: "We love to hear from our customers, particularly in terms of how they use the coconut powder, and we're very happy to see that it is proving to be such a popular coffee creamer."

The dry milk powder is designed to be very easy to use. It simply requires the addition of hot water. As a result, it can simply be sprinkled into a cup of coffee in the same way as milk-based coffee creamers, dissolving to provide that creamy taste that many coffee drinkers are looking for. Being coconut milk, the taste is slightly different from regular creamers which many people seem to enjoy.

"This product is delicious and creamy...we are currently using it as coffee creamer, but will try recipes from the included (as download) cookbook. the company is very customer oriented and we are pleased with the product," said Vera, a happy customer.

The coconut milk packages do not require refrigeration, and they are available in easy to carry packages. With this in mind, the dry coconut milk packages are great for traveling, camping, or backpacking.

"I use it in my coffee instead of cow's milk. It's much more convenient than buying the cans, plus I can take it when I travel. I like it," shared a satisfied customer.

Those who like to use creamer for coffee are encouraged to give the GraceKennedy coconut milk powder a try. The dry coconut milk powder can be purchased on Amazon.com in packages of 3, 6 or 12. A free recipe ebook is also included with every purchase for more ideas on how the product can be used.
