Box-n-Go offers a 21st-century storage unit concept for area residents. Modular units are delivered to the customer and then transported away when they are packed. They remain accessible at ground level.

Los Angeles CA: Box-n-Go and owner Stan Trakhtenberg are pleased to announce the company has introduced a new concept in self storage services. The firm has made storage and moving more accessible and convenient with the self-storage and moving services. The company provides self-storage modular containers in multiple sizes and delivers them to customers throughout Los Angeles, Long Beach, San Fernando Valley, Anaheim, Irvine and other parts of Orange County. Services are also available in parts of Riverside, Ventura, and San Bernardino counties.

The process is a three-step, easy to utilize concept. One or more storage containers in a range of sizes are delivered to the home or business location of the customer. There they can be easily filled at the convenience of the customer. The unused ones are removed at the same time as the filled containers are taken to the storage location.

This means the customer doesn't have to pack and unpack twice, removing much of the frustration and hard-work from the process, the company says. The storage boxes are fully accessible to customers and when the move or transition is complete, they can be delivered to the new location where they can be unpacked at the customer's convenience. There is no need to rent a moving truck. The packing and the unpacking at the end of the process can take as long as necessary.

Customers pay only for the room they use in the indoor climate-controlled secure warehouse facility. There are many uses for the storage services, ranging from de-cluttering a house while selling, summer storage for students, and protecting possessions while remodeling or renovating. Short or long-term storage is available and deliveries of stored containers can be made across town or across the country.
