Atlanta IT firm offers a descriptive blog and website about which IT services should be purchased by small businesses. The post explains why the listed services are important.

Atlanta GA: 1iX Network Solutions and Deborah Phillipeck are pleased to announce the release of their latest blog post about the types of services which are best hired for small businesses when they are expanding. Very small firms usually don't need specialized services for IT tasks. The work can be carried out in-house. When the firm grows beyond 25 employees, the picture begins to change. The in-house people may not be able to keep up with the expanding and more complicated needs of the firm.

The post explains which outside services are available and which would be the best options for a small business. IT managed support is a professional service which will be needed by every small business at some point or another. Better than repairing failing equipment is preventing problems before they occur. This type of professional can also be helpful when a part needs to be replaced or installed.

Remote IT support can be a service which also reduces down time. When there are issues with computer hardware or software, the small business doesn't have to call in a professional with lengthy travel time. Instead, remote consultation and support can handle many problems from a distance. Remote IT support eliminates downtime its related costs.

Another service which is a must for small businesses to maintain is data security. Any firms which work with sensitive information require proper security. A significant part of the hardware around the world is infected by malicious software. Even a good anti-virus software program is not likely to be enough to prevent attacks on the data and programs.

In addition to protection of the computer, protection of wireless networks is also crucial. IT services which provide security and backup for sensitive materials is a necessary part of businesses' protective strategy. Some businesses may need to be proactive in their choice of network and systems monitoring.
